The Come-Back of the "Unspeakable" Turk Is a Blot on Christian Civilization

ACCUSTOMED, as we have become, to tidings of the frequently recurring massacres and other atrocities inflicted on the Christian subjects of the Sultan by the Turkish government or through official connivance, instigation or permissive indifference, the American people were inexpressibly shocked by the massacre and other frightful cruelties to which a hundred thousand or more Christian residents and refugees were subjected when the city of Smyrna was burned and sacked after its recent capture by the Turkish army under Kemal Pasha. But the apparently authentic announcement, following closely on the heels of this tragedy, to the effect that Great Britain, France and Italy, now in possession of Constantinople, have consented to permit the Turks to resume control of their former European domain has called forth a storm of indignant protest throughout the United States.

The pestiferous blight of Turkish misgovernment throughout the present shrunken remnant of the once extensive and powerful Ottoman Empire is too distressingly notorious to require detailed specification or admit of argument, and history records that the same misguided tyranny, with like malign effects, has been characteristic of Turkish rule in each of the many lands over which at one time or another during the past six and a quarter centuries the half-civilized Turk has held sway.

From the year 1300 to the present day Turkey, otherwise known as the Ottoman Empire, has played an important part in Old-World affairs, chiefly as an ever active disturber of the peace of Europe and Asia, and for a while, threatening even to blot out Christian civilization. The country of which we are speaking is called Turkey because it was conquered by the Turkomans or Turks (a branch of the fierce and warlike Tartar race) and is still ruled by their descendants who style themselves Ottoman Turks in honor of Othman the founder and first sultan of Turkey. His name also appears in the same modified form in the designation "Ottoman" Empire.

Othman began his career in Tartary, in central Asia, as chieftain of a band of Turkoman freebooters who, like General Villa and his Mexican bandits, subsisted by pillaging adjacent communities. This licentious method of procuring the necessaries and luxuries of life held a strong fascination for the Tartar gentry by whom it was highly approved as honorable and genteel. Accordingly the success that attended Othman's leadership in this line of enterprise attracted a large following of bold and reckless adventurers so that he was soon able to muster a formidable cavalry force matchless in horsemanship and fighting qualities. This brigand army he led farther afield on raiding expeditions into the rich countries to the west in Asia Minor.

In return for their military service in war against the Mongols, the Sultan of Iconium, in Asia Minor (himself a Seljuk Turk), granted Othman and his followers land on which to settle in his dominions, but in so doing nursed a viper, for on the death of that monarch in 1298 Othman, with the support of his horde of marauders, forcibly usurped the regal power and made himself sultan in place of the rightful heir to the throne. Thus began the national existence of the Ottoman Turks, and the dominion, thus acquired at the start, was so expanded by successive wars of conquest during the next three centuries that at the peak of its greatness the Ottoman Empire extended from the confines of India westward across Asia and into Europe to the shores of the Adriatic Sea, and included the present "Balkan" countries, parts of Austria, Hungary and Poland, the larger part of southern Russia, Arabia, Egypt, and most of the countries that border the north coast of Africa.

In 1355 the Turks first invaded Europe, and for more than two hundred years thereafter they were the greatest military power in the world. So successful and cruel were they in extending their conquests that with good reason it was feared that the civilization of Europe would be overwhelmed in the bloody conflict and that Christianity would be forced to succumb to the degrading religion of Mohammed which these fanatical and semi-barbarous conquerors were propagating by the sword and by other means more cruel than death.

In 1453 (only 39 years before the discovery of America by Columbus) the Turks captured Constantinople, the imperial city which Constantine the Great, who promulgated Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire, had made his capital. For more than a thousand years it had stood as the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire and the stronghold of the Eastern Christian Church which had a membership of millions of devoted followers in Asia and eastern Europe. This was a severe blow to Christian civilization, for Constantinople thenceforth became the capital of the Ottoman Empire, and the magnificent Cathedral of Saint Sophia, until then the seat of authority of the Eastern Christians, was converted into a Mohammedan mosque presided over by the chief caliph of Islam. The Ottoman Empire attained its largest territorial expansion and greatest power during the reign of Soloman II, the Magnificent (1519 to 1566), who waged many successful wars of conquest; he conquered half of Hungary, invaded Austria and threatened to subjugate Germany, but was checked before the walls of Vienna in 1529. After his death the Turkish power began to wane, although for another century it continued a standing menace to Christendom, for as lately as 1683 Vienna was again besieged by the Turks.

Once knowing the characteristic faults and failings of the Turks it is plain to be seen why, although those of the present generation are as valiant warriors as their conquering ancestors, their dominions have diminished and their power has declined. Military prowess alone may be sufficient to acquire power over a country, but to perpetuate his power the conqueror must be gifted with ability to govern wisely and to develop the resources of the land and promote the prosperity of the inhabitants. The Turk is, and always has been, almost wholly devoid of these sustaining qualities. Mentally he is the same now as were his fierce, rude Turkoman forefathers who, as wandering tribesmen, inhabited the barren wastes of Turkestan before they erupted in quest of plunder into the more fertile countries of western Asia. In the same region where they originated are found today people of the same race living in the same primitive, nomadic way. The Turkoman's knowledge of government was limited to that of the tribal form; he had little knowledge of agriculture, none of finance, and as to industries and commerce—these did not xist in his native land, and, in countries where they thrived, interested him only as productive sources of plunder.

When, as conqueror, the Turk became ruler, with the cupidity of a freebooter he robbed his subjects by extortionate taxation which impoverished his dominions and, conjoined with other forms of oppression, discouraged enterprise and banished prosperity. In his ignorance and bigotry, the latter of which closes his mind to the acquisition of wisdom and makes him a hopeless case, he cannot appreciate the enormous evils of his misrule, for he has not yet learned the first principles of government, finance, economics, industry or commerce. In all these respects, and in his social ideals and regulations he is thousands of years behind the times, and since coming in contact with the advancing civilization of Europe he has retrogressed instead of progressing. When Turkey proved thus unfit to hold her own in competition with the rising Christian nations, under Nature's inexorable law of the survival of the fittest, her ultimate doom was sealed and has been in process of execution through the past two and a half centuries. The process would have been much more rapid and less painful, and the hoped-for consummation much nearer, if certain Christian Powers had not aided the Turks in holding Christian peoples in subjection.

Turkish Atrocities and Christian Animosities

Because of their lack of business ability the Turks, except those holding government jobs, are for the most part poorly paid laborers, as there is but little industrial development in the country while business and the lucrative professions are mostly in the hands of native or foreign Christians and Jews, the Christians being chiefly Greek and Armenian subjects of the Sultan. This condition is conducive to envy and race hatred on the part of the Turks. Add to this the fanatical belief prevalent among the Turks that the earth and the good things thereof are the rightful heritage of the faithful followers of Mohammed, and you have the principal cause of the persecution of Christians and Jews in Turkey. With the government setting the example of oppressing Christians, and corrupt officials practicing extortion on them, it is not surprising that the race hatred and covetousness of the Turkish populace is demonstrated in frequent outbreaks of mob violence to their persons, forcible violation of their homes and wholesale looting of their property. Naturally the Christian subjects of the Sultan can have neither love nor respect for a government that thus abuses them. The Turks, of course, regard such sentiments as disloyalty, and this, coupled with the irritating protests and even intervention by foreign governments in the interest of better treatment of the Christian subjects of Turkey, has caused some of the most atrocious outrages that Christians have suffered at the hands of the Turkish government.

Previous to the World War by far the greater part of the Christian peoples at one time included within the Ottoman Empire had been liberated from the Turkish yoke, either by winning their independence, as did Greece, Serbia and the other Balkan kingdoms, or by being annexed to adjacent Christian countries, and the only reason why the rest of them had not been rescued was that certain of the great Christian Powers, in their greed and jealousy of each other, could not agree on how the remains of the Ottoman Empire should be divided and apportioned among themselves. So they backed the Turk in holding what he had, which besides his Asiatic dominions included Constantinople and a considerable surrounding territory, in Europe, of immense commercial and strategic importance because it commanded the passage from the Mediterranean to the Black Sea.

One of the most important results of the World War was the eradication of Turkish power from Europe, for the victorious Allies gave Thrace to Greece and put the remainder of European Turkey, including Constantinople, under control of a British-French-Italian joint international commission, also established foreign mandates for the protection of the Christian peoples in Asiatic Turkey. This arrangement promised well until the recent crushing victory of the Turks, in battle with the Greeks before Smyrna, emboldened the former to march on Constantinople and demand the return of their late European domain. But in this crisis, as of old, the Turk wins through the disagreement of the Christian Powers. France and Italy favored the Turkish demands, the former through envy of England's commercial position, the latter because jealous of recent Greek territorial expansion in European Turkey. England favored a firm stand, but yielded rather than risk starting another world war by fighting Turkey backed by France and Italy. And so the "unspeakable" Turk comes back to resume his trouble-making career in Europe.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE LAWYER'S REBUKE.

THERE was something strangely familiar about that slight, graceful form and in those lustrous eyes—in that golden-crowned head, and the now happy, smiling lips.

"Miss Gladstone, I am very glad to meet you," she began, as she cordially put out her hand to her; then turning abruptly, and speaking with a slightly startled accent, she added:

"Archie, surely I have met her before?"

"Yes," he answered, his face glowing; "I see that you have recognized her."

"Star," and the tender inflection on that name told his mother everything, "she has seen the picture that I painted when I was in America, and she has now discovered who the original is."

"Yes, my dear," Lady Sherbrooke added, while she studied the beautiful, flushed face; "I do recognize your countenance, and I am quite proud of my son's achievements as an artist. You are an American, I believe. I am very happy to welcome you to England."

Star's heart beat rapidly at this cordial almost tender greeting, and wondered if she were indeed the same girl who, feeling so wretched and forlorn, had entered that room only two hours before.

"No, mother; Miss Gladstone is not an American," Archie explained. "She is an English lassie, and we met on shipboard while crossing the Atlantic; but more of that story anon," he said, significantly. "Now, will you entertain her for a few moments while I go and find Vivien?"

"With pleasure," Lady Sherbrooke responded, her heart bounding to hear those clear, joyous tones ringing through her son's voice—sounds which she had not heard before since his first return from America.

After finding his sister and taking her back to Star and his mother, Lord Carrol sought Mr. Rosevelt and had a long talk with him, explaining to him, as he had to his dear one, the unfortunate circumstances which had conspired to separate them, and learning in return something of their life during the past fourteen or fifteen months.

After this he rejoined the trio of ladies—those three beautiful women whom he loved above everything else in the world.

"The 'story' that you were going to tell me, Archie, but did not, as you were called away to London, is told. I read it in your face to-night, and in that of the beautiful girl to whom you have introduced me. My boy, I think now that you will be your own dear self once more," Lady Sherbrooke whispered, as he came and stood by her side, and his eyes, in reply, told her more than his lips could have done; but he added, in a low, intense tone:

"Is she not rightly named Star?"

"She is charming; I have no fault to find with her personally. But her family?" she questioned, cautiously.

"It is all right, also, mother mine. I will tell you all about it, tomorrow."

In a distant corner of the room Mrs. Richards and Josephine sat and viewed this meeting, bitterest envy rankling in their hearts.

"I hate her—I hate them both! and I wish I were dead!" Josephine cried, passionately.

When Mr. Rosevelt, Lord Carrol and his party were about retiring, they encountered the Richards in the great hall.

The young lord bowed coldly, and would have passed on, but Josephine, in a sudden fit of desperation, laid her hand upon his arm, saying, in low, fierce tones:

"I give you joy of your chambermaid bride! But beware! You will not feel quite so jovial when all London rings with the fact that the proud Lord Carrol has married a common house servant!"

"Miss Richards," he returned, haughtily, "even such a statement of facts could not injure the fair, pure woman whom I have chosen for my wife; but allow me to say that if you are so ill-disposed as to publish anything of the kind, you will find, to your sorrow, that the shafts from your venomous tongue will only serve to poison still further your own life."

"We shall see!" she sneered.

"You will find," he went on, as if he had not heard her, "that Miss Gladstone is so far above you, both morally and socially, that it does not lie in your power to do her the slightest injury."

"We shall see, my lord!" the maddened girl repeated, vindictively; but, without giving her time to say any more, his lordship passed on to Star's side, and drawing her hand within his arm, led her away to her carriage.

* * * * * *

The day came at last which was to decide Mrs. Richards' claim to the Thornton estates, and, according to appointment, she repaired to the office of Compton & Bailey, in the highest spirits, dressed in the most magnificent style, and accompanied by Josephine, clad with equal richness, and her husband.

"Well, Mr. Compton, my probation is ended at last," she said, gaily, to that gentleman, as she entered, and greeted him with her most gracious manner.

"Ahem! I suppose we may say that it is," he returned, in a strangely embarrassed way.

"Well, then, I presume there is no need of further delay, and we can take possession of the late Sir Charles' property as soon as we choose," she remarked, too deeply engaged with thoughts regarding her own brilliant future to notice his manner.

"Ahem!" the lawyer repeated, an uneasy expression on his face; "I did expect that I could tell you today everything was all right and you could go down to Halowell Park as soon as you liked; but——"

"But what?" Mrs. Richards demanded, with some show of impatience. "It appears to me that you are somewhat mysterious this morning, when heretofore you have acknowledged my relationship to Sir Charles Thornton to be proved beyond a doubt."

"Yes, madam, you have clearly proved, it cannot be contested, that you were a relative of the late baronet's; but—I am sorry—it will be a great disappointment to you, doubtless, to learn at this late day that another party has put in a claim for the estate, as being the nearest of kin."

The lawyer heaved a sigh of relief when he had stumbled through this piece of ill-news.

"What?" almost screamed Mrs. Richards, reeling where she stood.

She had never even thought of such a calamity.

"There is no nearer relative living," she continued, with pale lips. "You yourself said you were convinced of that."

"And so I was a month ago, madam; but I have been obliged to change my opinion since then."

"What—what has changed it?" she asked, trembling with fear and excitement.

It would be too dreadful now, when the prize was almost within her grasp, to lose it, and to be obliged to return poor and disappointed to America.

"You remember, perhaps," the lawyer, said, avoiding meeting her eyes, for they were wild in their expression, "that I told you that Sir William Thornton—the late Sir Charles' father—had a younger brother, Albert by name——"

"Yes, but you said that he left home years ago to go as a missionary to some outlandish place, where he died," interrupted the anxious woman.

"Where it was supposed he died," said Mr. Compton, with significant emphasis.

"Did he not die?—is he living?—has he returned?" his client gasped.

"No; he died some years ago; but he left a child. That child is living, and has put in a claim for the estate."

"But you told me he had left no issue——"

"It was all supposition, madam, since we could learn nothing to the contrary; but we have recently learned our mistake."

"He shall not have the property; he may be an impostor. I shall contest the point," Mrs. Richards said, with frantic vehemence.

"Ellen, do be reasonable," said her husband, sternly.

"Unfortunately, for your peace of mind, madam, it is a point that cannot be contested," returned Mr. Compton; "and if you will give me your attention for a few moments, I will explain it to you."

With a groan, Mrs. Richards sank into a chair, more wretched than she had ever been in her life.

"Your mother," began the lawyer, also seating himself, and motioning Mr. Richards and Josephine to do the same, "was half-sister to the late Sir Charles' mother. That made her half-aunt and you half-cousin to him. That relationship, however, would have been near enough to give you the property had no nearer claimant appeared. Sir William Thornton, the late Sir Charles' father, and Albert were own brothers; consequently, the child of Albert would be own cousin to the late Sir Charles, and, being a descendant on his father's side, by far the nearest of kin. Have I made it clear to you?"

He glanced as he spoke at Mr. Richards, who nodded, while his wife covered her face and groaned aloud.

"Now," resumed Mr. Compton, "I will tell you, in as few words as I can, the story of this younger brother, Albert Thornton. He was quite a number of years Sir William's junior, and at an early age dissented from the established church and religion of his ancestors, and insisted upon going as a missionary to Africa. This so enraged his father that he disowned him, charging him never to show his face inside his ancestral home again. Deeply wounded, but still adhering to his convictions of duty, he went to Africa, but was obliged to return to England again in the course of a couple of years, on account of failing health. He did not, however, present himself in the home from which he had been banished, for this neither his pride nor his wounded heart would allow him to do. He therefore settled in a distant county, where he had charge of a small parish at a merely nominal salary, during the remainder of his life. Not long after his return he married a gentle and lovely girl, and one child was born to them, who, recently seeing our advertisement for the nearest of kin to Sir Charles, has presented a claim for the estate."

"Who is this child?—where is it?—where did it come from at this late day?" questioned Mrs. Richards, who felt as if all the world was slipping away from her.

"Wait one moment and I will introduce you," the lawyer said, as, rising, he gently retired to his inner office.

He returned almost immediately with a lady on his arm. Mrs. Richards started to her feet and uttered a piercing scream the moment her eyes fell upon her.

The lady was Star Gladstone!

"That girl again!" shrieked Mrs. Richards. "You don't mean to tell me that she is the heir to Sir Charles Thornton's property?"

"Yes, madam, this young lady, and no other; but I was not aware that you had the honor of her acquaintance," responded Mr. Compton, with some surprise, as he led Star to a seat.

"But her name is Gladstone——"

"Have a little patience and I will explain still further," interrupted the lawyer, who was beginning to be disgusted with one who gave way so to passion.

"Miss Gladstone tells me that she has been known by that name all her life; that until her eighteenth birthday she was not aware that she was entitled to any other. But her father left a package of papers at his death, containing a history of his life, with all the necessary proofs, but charged her not to open it until she was eighteen years of age. In this she related what I have already told you, and also the fact that when he was a child, his father, through the death of a relative, succeeded to the title and estates of the Thorntons of Devonshire, upon condition that he assumed the name. Such things happen often here in England, you know, as in the case of Lord Carrol, whom you are acquainted with. When the elder Mr. Gladstone, or Thornton, died, of course William, his eldest son, succeeded to the baronetcy. Albert, the second son, upon his return and settlement in a parish of Derbyshire, gave his name as Rev. Albert Gladstone, and under this name married a Miss Chudleigh, who was also discarded by her family for wedding a poor dissenting clergyman—one who was deemed far beneath her socially, as no one suspected his connections with the Thorntons. After her death, and when Mr. Gladstone found that he also had not long to live, he said he could not reconcile himself to the thought of giving his orphan daughter to the care of those to whom he had been a stranger so long, although his own blood flowed in their veins; so he arranged to send her to a distant relative of his mother's in America, who agreed to take charge of her and her education for her sake. This last, however, Miss Gladstone has told me, and her residence in that country at the time of the death of the late Sir Charles, and her ignorance regarding her relationship to him, accounts for the fact that we have but just discovered her claim. Everything is as plain as black and white can make it. We have looked up the records, and find they correspond with the papers in her possession, and among which is a certificate of her parents' marriage, and one of her own baptism, together with other important documents; and now, I think, you cannot fail to perceive that Miss Gladstone, being Sir Charles Thornton's own cousin, is the nearest of kin, and we shall therefore be obliged to give her claim the precedence. I regret, madam," the lawyer concluded, in his blandest tones, "that we did not learn of this in season to save you the trouble and expense of such a long journey. However, I trust that you have reaped enjoyment sufficient from the trip to compensate you in a measure for your disappointment."

Mrs. Richards looked blankly from one to another of the occupants of the room, as if she could not, even yet, comprehend the magnitude of the calamity which had so unexpectedly overtaken her.

"I do not believe one word of it. It is all a piece of fraud to cheat me out of my rights," she cried, at length, while her own blazing eyes threatened to annihilate the beautiful girl, her successful rival, who sat opposite with downcast eyes, and feeling really sorry, in spite of all that she had suffered at Mrs. Richards' hands, for her distress over this terrible defeat.

"Do not allow yourself to become unreasonable over the matter, madam, I pray. There has not been, I assure you, even the suspicion of a fraud," Mr. Compton said, his own eyes beginning to take fire at this assertion. "The papers are all there on my table; everything has been written out in the plainest manner, and copies made of all the records which go to prove what I have told you. You can examine them, if you choose; but there cannot be the slightest doubt regarding Miss Gladstone's claim. She alone inherits everything belonging to the late Sir Charles Thornton."

"Oh, she has been the bane of our lives; she has ruined and upset every plan that we have made since the day when she first set foot in our house—since she came to us like the beggar that she was," sobbed the wretched woman, giving way utterly to her misery.

"Ah! then you are the woman to whom Albert Thornton confided his orphan daughter when he knew that he could not live?" said Mr. Compton, quickly, his keen mind at once grasping certain facts which Star, from a feeling of delicacy, had withheld from him, when, to her surprise, she learned that Mrs. Richards had also come to England to claim the Thornton estates.

"That has nothing to do with the case. She has ruined us, and that is enough to think about for one day, I should imagine," she retorted, angrily, and flushing.

"Ellen!" and Mr. Richards spoke very sternly; "you are as unreasonable as a child. Star has been kindly disposed from the first. It is you who have tried to ruin her—who have oppressed and sought to degrade her in a way that is a shame to you and your promises to her dead father. It is a bitter thing to be obliged to condemn my own wife thus publicly, but I cannot calmly listen to your calumniations of her, for, instead of being our ruin, she has been our salvation. Only this fall, when my business was tottering, and my reason with it—when I was upon the verge of bankruptcy—of self-destruction—I confess it with shame and sorrow now—she came to me like a beam of light and saved me from becoming both a bankrupt and a suicide. She gave me, or caused to be given to me, a check for ten thousand dollars, which set me upon my feet again, and we owe all that we are and have to her. To go still farther back, you owe your life to her mother. Josephine was saved from a dreadful death by Star's bravery; and, instead of hating her because unforeseen circumstances have raised her to a high social position, we should rejoice that it is so. Star, my dear girl, you have at least one grateful heart in my family."

He went over to her side and put out his hand to her, though he was so deeply moved that it shook like a leaf, and she took it with streaming eyes, and wholly unable to utter a single word in reply.

But his wife bridled angrily, losing all control over her tongue.

"I wish I had never set eyes on her face; and I wish your hand had been palsied before it ever took that ten thousand dollars from her. She came into our family and stole your heart from me by her arts and sly speeches; she wheedled out of Jacob Rosevelt the fortune that should have been mine; she tricked Josephine out of the man who should have married her—who would have done so but for her; and now she has come to steal the inheritance which ought to have been mine. I hate her, and I curse her from the bottom of my heart!"

"Then you are a thoroughly bad woman, and I am thankful that Sir Charles Thornton's estate is to pass into more worthy hands. Much as I sympathize with and respect your husband, madam, I cannot permit my young client to be insulted in my presence, and I have the honor to wish you a very good morning."

Mr. Compton said this very spiritedly, his fine face flushing with indignation, his lips curling with contempt, while he walked to the door of his office and held it open with such an air of stern determination that Mrs. Richards did not dare to disregard this very emphatic invitation to take her departure, and she walked wrathfully, but utterly crushed by her bitter disappointment, from the room.

CHAPTER XLIII.

"GOD BLESS OUR STAR."

Yes, beautiful Star Gladstone was the heiress to Halowell Park, and all other property belonging to the late Sir Charles Thornton.

Upon reaching home after her trip to California, which had been one of great enjoyment as well as profit, she resolved to settle down to a cozy, quiet life for the remainder of the winter, and make Uncle Jacob as comfortable as she possibly could.

She was sitting in her own pretty room one morning, something as Mrs. Richards had sat in hers only a few weeks previous when she had discovered herself to be the heir to Halowell Park, but looking happy and smiling, instead of angry and discontented.

She had brought a pile of music up there to sort and arrange, and as she was looking it over she came upon an old newspaper that had got mixed in with it.

She took it up, as one often does, and ran her eye carelessly over its columns.

It happened to be the very paper which contained the notice of Sir Charles Thornton's death, and the advertisement for the next of kin.

Star started as her eye caught that name. Then she went over both paragraphs carefully.

With heightened color she arose, and, going to a drawer in her dressing-case, drew forth that worn portfolio which we have seen before on several occasions.

Opening it, she took out those papers which she had read on the evening of her eighteenth birthday, and which had caused her so much agitation.

One of them contained a history of her father's life, as we have already stated.

After Star had read this paper through, she took up the others and went carefully over them; and these were certificates and records, all of which went to prove the truth of what he had written.

When she had been through them all, she gathered them up, together with the papers in which she had seen the advertisement, and carried them below to Mr. Rosevelt, told him something of her suspicions, and asked him to examine them and see if he thought she would be likely to inherit the Thornton property.

He did look into them carefully, and felt convinced that Star stood next in line to Sir Charles.

"Little girl," he said to Star, "there is, I believe, a good deal in this for you, and we must sail for England immediately," and Star felt her heart leap within her.

England was Lord Carrol's home.

Then her lips had curled with scorn at her own folly, but she agreed at once to do whatever Mr. Rosevelt advised, and in a week they were again crossing the broad Atlantic.

Upon seeking an interview with Compton & Bailey, and laying their case before them, they were gratified to learn that, although other claims had been filed, Star was the nearest of kin who had yet appeared to them.

The eminent lawyers at once set themselves to work to look up the case, and found all the records to correspond with those in her possession, and finally pronounced her to be the heir to the Thornton property.

Star felt greatly surprised and troubled upon learning that Mrs. Richards was one of the claimants, for she had no desire to contest any question with her, or to appear to triumph over her in any way. She simply wished to let her alone—to drop her entirely out of her life.

When the day came round that was to decide the important question for the expectant woman, Mr. Compton insisted, much to Star's annoyance, that it was necessary for her to meet her, and the rights of the true heir to be established in the presence of all parties.

The days, since the meeting and happy reconciliation of Lord Carrol and Star, had been full of joy and contentment.

She did not, however, tell him of her expectations regarding the Thornton property, but when the time appointed to meet Mrs. Richards arrived, she asked him to accompany Mr. Rosevelt and herself to Mr. Compton's office upon a little matter of business.

He, with them, remained in the inner office during the lawyer's interview with his claimants, and, the door being slightly ajar, they could hear all that passed in the other room.

Lord Carrol was greatly astonished at what he heard, but he was even more so when Mr. Compton came in and led Star forth to present her as the heiress to that large estate.

"I am almost afraid to approach you, my lady of Thornton. I begin to fear you may assume some new character at any moment, and soar so far beyond my reach that I shall lose you entirely," he said, half in jest, half in earnest, when that evening he came to see her in her own room in St. James' Square.

"You know I told you I was glad that you won me when I was a poor, obscure little maid," Star answered slipping her hand confidingly into his.

"I feel perfectly sure of your love," she added, "and yet I am not sorry that I can come to you now as an equal. I shall not be sorry to have the world say of you that you have chosen wisely," she concluded, while her glowing eyes and smiling lips told that, for his sake, she exulted in her new position and wealth.

"What the world might say of you, under any circumstances, would not trouble me," he answered, gravely. "But, I, too, am glad that I won your heart when you had nothing, if it secures to me your unbounded trust. I do not know either," he continued, smiling, "as I should have had quite as much assurance in approaching Sir Charles Thornton's wealthy heiress; and yet," with a proud uplifting of his handsome head, "while conscious of my own honor and rectitude, I have no need to fear to approach any woman whom I might love."

Star was standing by his chair, and she bent and touched her lips to his forehead as he said this. She was very proud of this grand, true man, who had won her to be his wife simply because he loved her.

But in the midst of her joy she could not help feeling something of sadness and pity for Josephine and her disappointed hopes.

It was no light thing to have loved and lost such a man as this, and she would gladly have comforted her had it been in her power to do so.

"Uncle Jacob," she said, more timidly than she was in the habit of addressing him, the next time she was alone with him, "I shall have so much money, now that I am to be mistress of Halowell Park, and—and when Archie takes me," she added, with a burning blush, "that I wish you would make another will, and give your fortune, or a part of it at least, to your 'nearest of kin.'"

"You are my nearest of kin," he said briefly.

"I know what you mean," she replied, affectionately; "our hearts are surely akin; but I really am very sorry for Mrs. Richards, and Josephine, not to mention poor Mr. Richards, who has had such a hard time of it; and perhaps they would feel more kindly toward me if they thought I did not care so much for money, and truly I do not—I never can use it all."

Jacob Rosevelt looked at her with tears in his eyes.

"My darling," he said, with emotion, "I believe you have the heart of a saint, but I cannot alter my will—everything I have belongs to you; but I leave you free to do whatever you choose with it. If you ever find people in need and wish to help them, give them what you like; but I shall never break the seal of my will."

He bent down and touched her forehead with his lips, and then left her; but her heart was filled with a song of praise.

A month, Lord Carrol said, was all the time that he could allow his fair bride-elect to prepare to become Lady Carrol.

"But I have so much to do!" Star objected, with crimson cheeks.

"Then you must increase your forces," he answered, with a fond smile. "I know that it is 'etiquette' to let the lady name the day, but considering all things, I think I ought to have that privilege. Darling, we have been separated so long that I do not feel like living without you a day more than is actually necessary. My mother wants you to come to her in Belgrave Square, and remain as her guest, while she and Vivien will assist about the wonderful trousseau, which they consider indispensable for the occasion under discussion."

It was of no use for Star to make objections, for they were every one overruled, and it was at length decided that Lord Carrol should have his way, and she went to Belgrave Square for the intervening month.

Mr. Meredith was cordially urged to remain in London until after the wedding, and as Grace had been sent for to act as bridesmaid, and a pair of clear gray eyes had earnestly seconded the appeal, he could not refuse.

He bore this "blighting" of all his previous "hopes" with wonderful equanimity, however, and ere the eventful day arrived that was to make Star a bride, he had won a promise from lovely Vivien Sherbrooke that at the end of another year she would become his wife.

Mrs. Richards, with her family, lost no time in returning to America after this crushing disappointment.

They could not remain and face the people to whom they had proudly boasted of their future greatness, nor could they bear to look upon Star's happiness and triumph over them; while, besides all this, they were greatly cramped in purse, after all the extravagant outlay which Mrs. Richards had insisted was necessary for people with their expectations.

Mr. Richards was very much depressed, for, to say nothing of the money which they had spent, he feared the worst from his long absence and negelect of business.

He went to see Star and Jacob Rosevelt before they sailed; he could not leave without bidding them farewell, and assuring them of his gratitude and good will.

The Forgotten Woman

by Alice L. Whitson

Not until Jim Cody was floundering in the sea did the struggle cease.

"What am I?"

"This," he cried shrilly—"the sacred sacrament has been defiled.

Zane in a deep chair read snatches from Evangeline to the girl beside him.

PART I.

THE soft blue waters of a calm sea lapping gently the white sand of Deeds Cove was as a benediction of peace and happiness to the inmates of the squatty cabins that dotted the shore.

One fish catch after another furnished the thrills of the settlement, and with the regularity of the rising and receding of the tide were the nets drawn in, mended and cast again.

Simple and kind in the ordinary relations of life, but ignorant and untaught and hard as nails in their orthodox creed were the fisher folks of Deed's Cove; even old Aaron Deed, peacemaker and settler of all disputes, having little tolerance for one who failed to walk uprightly according to their enlightenment.

It was net casting time and all along the white shore men and women worked over their nets with the rapidity and ease that comes from long years of training.

Side by side Jim Cody and Zane Bradley, champion fishermen of Deed's Cove, were straightening their nets. Alike in their stalwart forms and strength were these two men but as different otherwise as day is different from night.

Cody had lived his life among the settlers of Deed's Cove; his word was law, people feared him because of his brutal strength.

Zane Bradley, though physically as strong as Jim, was a man of mystery; he had come to Deed's Cove some five years ago, from whence nobody knew and nobody cared, for his fine, lovable and gentle manners had won for him a place in the hearts of the people that death alone could erase.

Along the shore road walked Jane Stirs whom a false step had placed beyond the fisherfolks' pale of respectability. At her side ran the false step—a little boy of five summers—obviously in love with life, and known in Deed's Cove as Zack; breaking away from his mother's restraining hand and running swiftly, little Zack made for the net-mending crew along the water's edge, pausing at last beside Zane Bradley.

"Seems to know his kin, all right," Jim laughed meaningly, "and——"

But before the sentence was finished the child had moved over, inspected the net of Jim, then walked on towards the next worker.

"Get back—get back!" called the voices of excited women, "you son of satan, get back," until little Zack, frightened at the loud noise, paused in his track.

Suddenly Zane Bradley, rising to his feet, bade the crowd be silent.

"Where is your heart, your manhood and womanhood," he cried, "that you would thus treat a child?"

"Yeh," rang in the voice of Jim Cody, "let a stranger lead you—but remember Zack wasn't born till after Zane Bradley came to the Cove."

The ugly insinuation caused the blood in Zane Bradley's veins to run hot, and springing on the speaker struck him full in the face.

Instantly a fight such as only the fisherfolks of Deed's Cove could appreciate was on, and not until Jim Cody was floundering in the sea did the struggle cease. Brushing the dirt from his sleeves and hands as though he were brushing away some very objectionable matter, Zane, amid the shouts of admiration, took little Zack by the hand and lead him back to his mother.

"Thank you, Mr. Zane," said the woman dully. "He belongs to Jim, and I'm hoping that some day his father will find himself as he used to be, and come back and claim his child."

From the doorway of the cabin, different from other cabins of Deed's Cove in respect to comfort within and blooming things without, old Aaron Deeds, gripping the slender hand of a fair young woman, watched the fight.

"So long as women go wrong," he said thoughtfully, "they can expect to be reviled."

"And what about the man, Gran'ther, should he go free?"

The old man looked at the young girl beside him in amazement, then patted her cheek tenderly.

"It's Bible teaching, Mary," he said a bit less sternly. "Like infant damnation without baptism, we don't know why—we just know it's so—that's all."

Mary Deed shook her head disbelievingly as she looked pityingly at the Stairs woman who with her little son was walking towards the sunset along the shore road.

"She must be very lonely and unhappy among these people, Gran'ther," said the girl thoughtfully, "but I cannot believe she is the vile woman the Cove pictures her."

Old Aaron for once in his life seemed to have no answer to the girl's question but went strolling off towards the group on the shore, where Jim Cody in his dripping garments stood explaining to a bunch of sympathizing friends how Zane tripped him into the ocean.

While Mary, as soon as Aaron Deed's back was turned, had made her way into their plenteous pantry, filled a basket with food and taken the narrow path that circled the Cove at the foot of the hill and presently stood waiting in the bend of the road for Jane and little Zack to overtake her.

"The apples are for little Zack," she explained when she put the basket in Jane's hand, "and the other things are for you."

Jane took the gift with a thankful heart, and tears were in her eyes when she looked up again.

"If it wasn't for you and Mr. Zane," she said softly, "I reckon I'd have to leave the Cove."

"Some day," said Mary encouragingly, "little Zack will grow up and take you away and then you won't mind going."

"No," Jane answered, "nothing good would come of that—it is here I lost my respectability and it's here only that I have the chance to regain it—and—and—I ain't as mean as I am painted, Miss Mary."

"Of course you are not, Jane," said Mary softly, then waving a kindly good by, the girl sped back in the direction of Deed's cabin.

Where the cabin path joined the shore she encountered Zane.

"Give an account of yourself," chided Zane Bradley, "where have you been hiding?"

"Hiding's right, Zane," laughed the girl. "I followed Jane Stairs by the Cove path to the end of the road to give her a basket of food."

Zane smiled his appreciation of the act and then reached for her hand.

"I'm going to cast my net around Rocky Point tonight—want to go with me?"

The girl laughed happily; she loved the sea, she loved the swirling waters of Rocky Point, and most of all she loved Zane. Zane had been a big brother to her, teaching her in the five years of his sojourn in Deed's Cove the knowledge he had gained through years of hard work at college—but she paused to follow the dictations of her own heart.

"There is supper to get, Zane," she said slowly.

"Supper can wait," answered Zane, "the sunset won't—'twill soon be twilight on the water—and—I have something to tell you."

"You win, Zane," Mary laughingly responded, and a few minutes later they put out to sea.

The last rays of the sun making a halo about the head of Mary Deed, who seemed suddenly to the man in the boat a vital part of it all—the sea, the sky, the singing birds and the lonely shore of Deed's Cove. Just as Zane had predicted, there had been a wonderful sunset, a more wonderful twilight, and yet he realized when they stood again at the door of old Aaron Deed's cabin that the story he had intended to tell the girl was still untold.

Through half-closed eyes he watched Mary move swiftly about the cabin—watched with a bit of wonder in his soul where the girl got her exquisite daintiness. As if in answer to his thought, old Aaron Deed while waiting for his supper became reminiscent and told Zane of the stormy night some eighteen years ago when the great ship Pandora was wrecked. Vividly he pictured the raging water, the forked lightning and the mad winds, then in a more gentle tone of voice he told of the morning after, how among the dead bodies on the white sand of Deed's Cove he had found a satin-lined basket containing the wee bit of humanity which he had warmed back to life and christened Mary Deed.

"She's been the joy of my life, Zane," he said softly, "but sometimes I feel I am committing a great wrong by keeping her in this place; she doesn't belong here, Zane, she is a beautiful flower but strangely out of place in this garden."

"Perhaps," said Zane thoughtfully, "time will eventually carry her back to her natural environments."

But before Zane had suggested how this might be accomplished, the young lady in question was calling them to supper.

Zane noticed with a new warmth in his heart her grace at the table; what a joy it would be to have a sweet young thing like Mary to sit opposite him at a well-appointed table! So absorbed was he in idle dreaming that he forgot to eat.

"What's the matter with my food, Mr. Zane, that you cannot eat?" inquired the girl archly.

For the second time in the same day Zane felt the blood run riot in his veins, but to Mary's question he had the answer only his lips refused to state it.

When the dishes by Mary and Zane had been washed and put away, the three sat about the open fire, for though it was spring the chill of winter still lingered about the waters of Deed's Cove.

The cheerful blaze on the wide hearth cast long, black shadows across the red cedar beams in the cabin and fell in dancing fire fairies on the back wall. Zane in a deep chair by the window read snatches from Evangeline to the girl beside him, and old Aaron Deed looking on, realized with great satisfaction in his heart that should anything happen to him, his child would have another to look after her. Slipping his weather-beaten cap from the peg near the doorway, the old man moved out into the night for a stroll on the sand.

"A little bit of Evangeline goes a long ways with Gran'ther," laughed Mary when she noticed the vacant chair.

"And how about Mary?" asked Zane, bending tenderly over her.

"Oh," answered the girl happily, "I never get enough; I'm always sorry when we've finished, and the same old story is forever new to me when we read it again, and sometimes I almost wish I could have such a romance."

"You!" exclaimed Zane in surprise—"you hungering for romance!" Surely, thought the man, this was the time to tell Mary the secret of his heart. Laying the book aside, he sat for a moment staring at the girl in silence, wondering in his gentle way how best to tell her he loved her.

"Whatever is the matter with you, Zane Bradley?" exclaimed Mary. "Anyone would think you had suddenly lost your best friend. What's ailing you—are you growing tired of the Cove?"

Zane came back to normalcy with a start.

"Yes—no—well, maybe I am tired of the Cove," he exclaimed, "maybe I am pining to get away for a little while—but what about you? Don't you ever long to get away from these sordid things—the rising and setting of the sun, the drawing and casting of nets, the constant lapping of water against the shore, the loneliness and monotony of it all—aren't you hungry for other things?"

Mary was surprised at this sudden outburst of the heretofore gentle Zane. Then she remembered that Zane had not, like herself, spent his life at Deed's Cove; perhaps he did long for things of which she knew absolutely nothing. And moving a bit closer, she laid her hand on his arm.

"Zane," she said sweetly, "I guess I'm happy enough here, with you to teach me and Gran'ther to spoil me and the settlement to look after. I think I'd ask no more of the world than what is already mine."

And Zane, meeting the frank, innocent, affectionate gaze she bestowed upon him, realized the heart of her was still unawakened to the beauty of love, and the time was not yet ripe to tell her of his own.

But the next day the long arm of destiny reached out for Zane Bradley, and when he came hurriedly to tell Mary good by he found old Aaron also, and there was no chance to tell her anything except he would be back before the summer was over, bringing her anything her young heart might desire to have.

"You are exceedingly happy over leaving us, Zane," said old Aaron as the three stood arm in arm on the small porch.

"Not happy over leaving you," answered the man, "but I must admit I am a happy man. For five years I have carried a burden of guilt not mine; today I have learned it is no longer necessary, and I must get back to New York as soon as possible."

Old Deed reached out his strong hand to the man at his side and gripped it firmly.

"Whatever injustice you have suffered, Zane," he said thoughtfully, "I am sure you had a good cause for so doing. May God prosper you since you are freed from it."

"Thanks," answered Zane, "and should you need me before I return, this address will find me,"—and taking a card from his pocket bearing the address of a well-known New York club, he placed it in old Aaron Deed's hands.

Without the slightest hesitancy Mary kissed him good by and wished him Godspeed and made him promise over and over to hurry back.

How Zane wanted to tell her of his love, how he wanted to carry her off with him only the Lord knew, and his brightest hope in leaving her was that his absence might awaken in her girlish heart the love for which his own soul craved.

At the water's edge Zane looked back, and then jumping into his own little boat he rowed across the Cove to Creighton's Landing and took the north-bound train.

* * * * *

Without Zane Mary found the evenings long and lonely—the books the same but not nearly so interesting as when they had studied and read them together—and finally in order to break the monotony she asked old Aaron to let her open a little school for the children of the "Cove." The suggestion pleased old Aaron—as nearly all Mary's suggestions did—and shortly after Mary began sharing her knowledge with the children of Deed's Cove in the little log church on the outskirts of the settlement. Four miles across the Cove was Creighton's Landing, and nearby Creighton Lodge, where handsome, profligate Sidney Creighton, who in two years had squandered a fortune which had taken two generations to accumulate, was hiding from his creditors, and laughing at them while he lived in luxury at the Lodge—but it was only a matter of a short time until Sidney found the enforced retirement boresome, and one day, wandering aimlessly along the shore, he came upon the boat in which Zane had rowed to Creighton on the day of his departure. On one side of the boat in big letters was painted "Deed's Cove," and on the other were the letters "Z. B."

For a moment Sidney eyed it curiously, then in a sudden spirit of adventure he broke the already rusted lock and set out to find Deed's Cove.

Some two hours later he landed at the little dock facing the church schoolhouse, just as Mary and her charges came down the slope and turned into the shore road.

Sidney smiled winningly. "I did not expect such a welcome committee," he said, addressing Mary, whose beauty both pleased and astonished him.

"We always welcome strangers," laughed Mary, "we have so few of them."

Suddenly her eyes fell upon the old familiar boat and she smiled sweetly.

"I see you are using Zane's old boat," she said pleasantly, "therefore I suppose you must be the friend he left it with when he went to New York."

Sidney's face darkened at the name "Zane," but he smiled again after Mary spoke, for through her conversation he discovered where the one man in the world he dreaded more than all his creditors to meet happened to be at the present time. Then politely introducing himself, declared he had borrowed the boat from a friend across the Cove.

"It's Zane Bradley's, anyway, laughed Mary. "Even were his initials not on it I would know it just the same, for I have gone out in it with him to cast his nets so many times."

The knowledge that Zane Bradley had been a fisherman at Deed's Cove caused Sidney Creighton's heart to beat a bit faster than usual—he knew better than anyone else in the world why Zane Bradley had given up friends, home and business and slipped out of New York more than five years ago—but to discover him as a fisherman was indeed shocking.

Only for a moment, however, did this worry young Creighton. He was bored to death with solitude—here was a chance to at least break the monotony, and presently he was standing beside the girl smiling joyously.

"We won't quarrel about the boat," said Sidney pleasantly, "so long as it has brought me such good luck. And since I'm here," he continued softly, "would you mind showing me through the settlement?"

Mary agreed readily * * * * And that night Sidney gave an ugly little laugh as he fastened the boat at Creighton Landing.

"This may be your boat, Zane," he said jeeringly, "and the girl may be an old flame, but one thing sure—you won't find things the same when you get back to Deed's Cove."

* * * * *

In the months that followed, Deed's Cove took on a new beauty in Mary's eyes. Sidney Creighton brought all his powers of fascination to bear on the innocent young girl, and unable to distinguish between love and fascination, Mary soon believed that the sun, moon and stars existence centered about Sidney Creighton, so far as she was concerned.

Sidney came daily to Deed's Cove at school closing time, wooing Mary so openly that old Aaron soon forgot his misgivings, and found pleasure in Sidney's society while Mary cooked the evening meal; Sidney remaining his host's invitation, would amuse the old man with strange tales of adventure.

Then would come a heavenly evening with Mary in the old-fashioned room or on the white sand while old Aaron contentedly smoked his pipe before the cabin.

With Zane Bradley life had suddenly become very strenuous existence; day by day business matters so long neglected urgently called his attention, and night after night as he marked the passing time on his calendar he resolved to retire with the new day to Deed's Cove and the girl, but one morning when coming into his office he found a letter from Mary that changed his world altogether.

"DEAR ZANE:" ran the letter in a free, bold hand. "I am the happiest girl on earth—it is only natural that you should be the first to know about it, because if you had not taught me and made me worthy, this joy could not be mine. I am to be married, and I have not even told Gran'ther yet. I shall leave Deed's Cove, after all, Zane, for my lover is a man of the world.

"I was hoping you might return before I went away for you are so dear to me, big brother in fact, but now it is too late—I shall be married before you get this.

"Ever your loving

"MARY."

Once, twice, thrice did Zane read Mary's letter, then into his face came a look of agonized misery, and instead of returning to Deed's Cove as he had planned, he hastily penned a note to Mary wishing her all happiness and prosperity, and the next day he caught an outbound steamer for England.

* * * * *

Spring slipped away and summer came to Deed's Cove and still Sidney Creighton was a daily visitor, making friends of the fishermen and bringing to the face of Mary Deed such beauty as can only come from perfect happiness—then suddenly—just as Sidney Creighton had come into her life—he was gone. There came a day and then another when Sidney failed to come, when Mary's face grew pinched with anxiety, and at last when the suspense was growing unbearable—there came a brief letter to Mary—heartless, cold thing it was—over and over through tear-dimmed eyes Mary read the massive, and ever and ever she saw the same cold words:

"Have been called suddenly to Japan—will come for you when I return—until then just forget these weeks we've had together—and shall our secret with no one. As ever, SIDNEY."

Old Aaron brought the letter to Mary, and his expression of eagerness was piteous as he watched her read and re-read the contents. Then Mary, seeing the look of eagerness on the old face, suddenly crumpled the letter in one small shaking hand, and with an attempt to smile in the old joyous way, told him in a tone strange even to herself, that Sidney had been called away.

Aaron Deed asked no questions, and in the long, miserable days that followed pretended to be blind to her suffering, giving without stint the parental love of his big, unselfish heart.

* * * * *

Winter had settled over the world and the white sands were slumbering peacefully under their whiter blanket of snow when a New York daily accidentally found its way to Deed's Cove, wrapped about some fishing supplies ordered by Jim Cody. Shortly after the arrival of the paper Mary, coming home from her school, found old Aaron Deeds walking the floor, grasping the newspaper in one shaking hand.

With great tenderness he brushed the snow from Mary's coat and helped her remove it, making an attempt to hide the paper—but Mary had seen it, and guessing from her Gran'ther's expression that something unusual was troubling him, she insisted on seeing the cause.

"'Twill hurt you, Honey," said the old man tenderly, "but you will have to know sooner or later and it's best that you learn it from me."

A moment later Mary was staring at the page whose society column featured the picture of Sidney Creighton and his "heiress bride"—and the picture Mary read with unbelieving eyes the announcement that they were leaving for a long trip abroad.

"This accounts for his runnin' off as he did," said the old man sternly, striking the picture in face as he spoke. Then at the look on Mary's face he dropped the paper and caught her in his big protecting arms, cuddling her as a mother might and telling her over and over that Sidney wasn't worth remembering, trying to comfort her with the suggestion that they could get along without one of his kind better than with him, and surely Zane would soon be coming home.

At the mention of Zane Mary lifted from her shoulder a face drawn and haggard with fear and pain * * * * "It might be all right but for this—Gran'ther——and—and——"

As she spoke she drew from a hiding place about her throat a slender wedding ring on a thread-like chain. "This, Gran'ther," she continued, "was given me by Sidney months a

There are Christmas suggestions for every member of the family, from baby grandmother, grandfather and even more to ome next month. Thank you, kind people.—Ed.

VERMONT.

ELLO EVERYBODY:

This is the Christmas duffle I promised you some onths ago and I don't know where to begin.

I think a nice plan is to have a little book and when ou hear someone wishing for something you can make, rite it down. It will save lots of thinking next December. It is well, too, to make things along through he year if you can and save the rush at Christmas ime.

It ought not to trouble you to find something for the ousewife or the bride-to-be. Sofa pillows are always ceptable and can be made out of almost every kind f cloth. I like washable ones made with snaps along ne side so they may be slipped off and onto the pilows easily. For the camper, take an ordinary sofa illow and cover it with oilcloth and then make a cover f some strong material. The oilcloth keeps the pillow ry when left out in damp weather. If you live in he country you can make pine or balsam pillows for our city friends.

Make sewing bags out of odds and ends for women nd girls. These may be made in all sizes from the g darning bag, made like a laundry bag with "Darn he Thing" embroidered across it, down to the little ag in which to carry scissors and thimble to the sewcircle. A bag for corsets may be made like a laundry bag with "Corsets" in big letters and a few owers embroidered on it. A paper-and-string bag is ade on the plan of a shoe bag. It has one big pocket or wrapping paper and a small pocket for string.

You all know about crocheted, tatted and knitted articles, such as yokes and mats, so we will leave those ut this trip.

You kodak fiends might make a small book of snaphots. One I saw was made of wrapping paper tied ogether with red ribbons. Make one of local views to end to a distant friend or one of snapshots taken on trip for one who could not go.

Spectacle wipes may be made from small pieces of hamois skin. Cut a three-inch square and two twonch squares and buttonhole them loosely around the dge. Lay the small squares one on each side of the arge square and cornerways and tack with a needle nd thread in one corner and put on a tiny bow of ibbon.

Bath cloths may be made from a square loosely nitted of cotton yarn, white, of course, with a shell order of colored silkateen. Size may vary to suit aste and the border may be any color. If you don't nit, these may be crocheted, but the knitted ones are ofter.

A pair of silk stockings for the baby may be made rom the tops of a pair of silk elbow-length gloves. se an old stocking for a pattern and allow for seams. aby jackets may be made from pieces of outing flanel. I made some from plisse last Christmas and the others thought they were nice. You may trim them as fancy as you please. Moccasins may be made of eavy outing flannel, buttonholed loosely around the dge and with eyelets for lacing. The laces are twisted ilkateen to match the buttonholing. They may be nade of felt, old felt hats will do, or the tops of kid gloves. Slumber slippers may be made from pieces of outing flannel or canton flannel. Use a stocking foot for a pattern but cut considerably larger as they don't stretch like stockings. Finish like the baby moccasins.

A friend wanted tea towels. I rummaged out some old outing flannel night dresses and tore out squares from the best parts of them, hemmed and laundered them and they made very nice ones as they were absorbent.

For the teachers, a little calendar made of ribbon, using ribbon one and one-half inches wide of some dark color. Cover an inch brass ring with silkateen to match ribbon. Take a piece of ribbon nine inches long and fringe both ends one-half inch. Draw through the ring one-third of its length and catch with needle and thread to prevent slipping. Paste a small photo of yourself, just the head and shoulders is best, on the upper or short piece and a small calendar pad on the long piece. I have seen pretty Christmas seals used in place of the photo but the kiddies all like teacher's picture best.

I make handkerchiefs and collars from scraps of lawn or any light weight white goods and odds and ends of lace. Here is a new way to make handkerchiefs for the Sunday School children. For boys, take a scrap of goods like the handkerchief and make a tiny pocket in one corner. Make a flap to drop down over and sew on a dress snap. Then they won't lose their Sunday School money. For girls, sew on a crocheted rose and leave one petal loose. Sew a snap on the petal. I like to go around the handkerchief with a single crochet stitch in colored thread and make the rose to match the edge.

I save the blotters from my pads of paper and make blotting pads. Take a pretty post card and cut the blotting paper to match. Punch two holes, one-half inch apart in each end and tie with baby ribbon. You may use as many sheets of blotting paper as you wish. My ribbon is usually off candy boxes.

Tie racks may be made from embroidery hooks wound with ribbon or silk and finished with a bow of inch-wide ribbon and a ring to hang it up by. These are nice for little girls to hang hair ribbons on.

Ribbon book marks are made of one yard of half-inch ribbon and four small brass rings. Cut off one-third of the ribbon, cover the rings with silkateen to match ribbon, and sew a ring onto each end of the short piece. Pass the long piece through one ring and bring the ends together at the other one. Catch with a thread to keep from slipping and sew the two remaining rings onto the ends.

My son's wife makes sewing cards for the little ones. Draw pictures on pieces of pasteboard and punch holes with a needle about half an inch apart. Give them a needleful of yarn or silkateen and let them sew back and forth through the holes. Good for rainy day entertainment.

Oftentimes you can get ideas from the novelties pictures in mail-order catalogues.

If I have large pieces left when making up gingham, percale, lawn or similar goods I make small aprons of them.

Here is a case for handkerchiefs, or ribbons. Take two paper napkins and lay a sheet of cotton wadding between them. Bind around the edge with inch ribbon or silk and fold up one side at one-third of the length and sew over and over. Fold down the upper third to make a sort of envelope and tie a piece of ribbon around to keep it closed. A case for veils is made the same way, only you stop when you get the binding on and roll it up and tie the ribbon around it. They are really very durable. Mine lasted several years. The binding can be stitched on your machine. You might make them of cloth if you preferred. By using larger squares you can make cases for doilies or centerpieces. Roll them like the veil case. If you have to piece the cotton wadding, catch it together to prevent slipping.

Most of us know some old couple that live alone, or some old person living alone. Boxes of food make an acceptable present for them. Boxes of fruit or candy are always welcome, especially if the candy is homemade. If you live where you can raise vegetables you might send some to some poor family that doesn't raise them. A piece of meat or a dressed fowl could be included.

I hope I'll have new ideas next year.

Au revoir. VERMONTER.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS AND MRS. WILKINSON:

I enjoy reading COMFORT and most of all the Sisters' Corner. The letters are helpful, interesting and worthwhile.

Have any of the sisters tried to make coat hangers at home? I'll tell you what I did. From a wooden barrel hoop I cut a piece of wood the length desired for hanger. This I washed and after it was thoroughly dried I cut a strip of cloth an inch longer than the hanger and about five inches wide, sewing them around the piece of hoop on the under side of the hanger with a running stitch. In the middle of the hanger I sewed a piece of the cloth that was used for covering and the hanger was finished. A loop of ribbon could be used instead. These hangers are easy to make and very decorative if pretty material is used for covering. One barrel hoop makes two hangers.

Some people find it hard to wash pillows containing feathers, yet it is a simple matter if washed the following way: Open the pillow in one corner and into this opening pour hot water over the feathers. They will form a wet mass. Remove this and wash the feathers in soapy water, rinsing well. Put the feathers back into the pillow case, which has been washed, and hang it in the sun to dry. The feathers will be clean, light and fluffy and not be spoiled.

I hope that I will see my letter in print for I know that I am worthy of becoming a sister. I am fourteen

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE COMFORT Sisters' Pin this month is awarded to Mrs. A. E. Colby, Carlotta, California, for the best recipe. By "best" is meant, as has been explained before, the recipe that gives the exact quantity of ingredients used and the easiest-to-understand method of combining them. Many of the others were almost as good and are quite as much appreciated.—Ed.

MEAT BALLS.—One pound uncooked beef chopped fine, two tablespoons shortening, one tablespoon flour, one teaspoon salt, one teaspoon curry powder, one onion chopped, one cup strained tomatoes or one can tomato sauce and one-fourth teaspoon pepper. Make the meat into little balls. Put one tablespoon shortening in frying-pan, and in it cook the onion slowly without browning until onion is soft. Then add the curry powder and meat balls, and shake pan over a quick fire for ten minutes. Put the second tablespoon of shortening in another frying-pan, and when hot add the flour. Stir well, then add salt, pepper and tomato or tomato sauce. Let come to boil and then pour over meat balls. Cover and cook slowly until balls are thoroughly cooked. Serve with boiled rice.—MRS. A. E. COLBY, Carlotta, Calif.

HOLIDAY SALAD.—Use slices of pineapple with centers removed, thinly-sliced sweet oranges with centers and seeds taken out, white grapes peeled and seeded, jellied nuts, small white leaves from heart of lettuce, and cream cheese dressing. Drain one can of pineapple, reserving the juice for the jellied nuts. Soak one tablespoon of gelatine in one-half pint of cold water ten minutes, then dissolve in three-fourths cup of hot pineapple juice. Pour a little into the bottom of a small mould, and when it stiffens press several nuts into it and cover with more gelatine, repeating until all the nuts and gelatine are used. The mould should be kept where it will stiffen more rapidly than the dish of gelatine, otherwise it may be necessary to soften it over warm water so that it will pour. The cream cheese dressing is made by mixing one-third teaspoon of mustard, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-third teaspoon of paprika, a pinch of white pepper and one teaspoon of sugar, then beat in alternately two tablespoons of vinegar and six of salad oil, and lastly gradually adding one cream cheese mashed with a little fresh or sour cream. Place the jellied nuts in the center of plate, surround with pineapple, small mounds of the orange and grapes and to one side the lettuce. The dressing is placed in spoonfuls through the salad.

MUTTON BROTH.—One pound of lean meat and one quart of water. Cut the meat into small pieces, cover with cold water and heat slowly. Add one teaspoon salt and one-half saltspoon pepper and a small slice of onion. Simmer until the meat is in shreds, strain, cool and remove fat. To one quart of broth allow two tablespoons of rice washed and soaked half an hour. When broth is boiling add the rice, simmer till it is tender, being careful not to let the water boil away. Season and serve at once. For seasoning, a little curry powder used as you would use cayenne or a saltspoon of celery salt or a few leaves of fresh mint.

NOODLES FOR SOUP.—Beat one egg well, add a pinch of salt and flour enough to make a very stiff dough; roll very thin, dredge with flour to keep from sticking. Let remain on board two hours, then roll up as for jelly roll. Begin at end and slice into very thin strips, keep these strips floured until you are ready to drop them into the soup which should be done shortly before serving.

MEAT LOAF.—Put meat through chopper and add salt, pepper and sage to taste. Chop one small onion and add with a pinch of allspice. Into this stir one-half cup of uncooked oatmeal, put into buttered pan, dot with small pieces of butter and add enough hot water to come almost to top of meat. Bake in hot oven.—MRS. CLARA ROMANG, Barnesdale, Ore.

RAISIN PIE.—Pastry: Sift together one heaping cup of pastry flour, one-fourth of a teaspoon each of baking powder and salt. Rub in, or cut in, with two knives one-fourth of a cup of lard or vegetable shortening. Mix this with cold water. Do not knead, but shape into a ball on a floured board and roll fairly thin. Spread with one-fourth of a cup of butter, very slightly softened if too hard, and sprinkle with flour. Fold several times, cut in two, roll one piece thin for the under crust, and after rolling the other half thin, cut in strips and lay on top of the filling.

FILLING: One and a half cup of washed and seeded or seedless raisins, one cup of water, half a cup of brown sugar, one tablespoon of vinegar, the juice of one lemon and a little of the grated rind, and one tablespoon of butter or clarified beef fat, cooked together. When the raisins are well puffed, cook in one teaspoon of flour mixed with a little cold water. When nearly cold fill lined pie tin and bake in a fairly hot oven. Prunes may be cooked in the same way.

STAR CAKE.—Sift together one and one-half cup of sifted flour, one rounding teaspoon of baking powder, and two tablespoons of cornstarch. Cream one-third cup of butter, add one cup of sugar and beat light. Add two well-beaten egg yolks and one teaspoon of vanilla. Add the flour alternately with one-half cup of milk to the egg mixture, and, lastly, add the whites of two eggs beaten stiff. Bake in a moderate oven in a star-shaped tin.

STAR CAKE.

FROSTING—One cup of granulated sugar and one-fourth cup of milk stirred until it boils. Cook five minutes without boiling. Beat hard, holding the stew-pan in a dish of cold water. When it begins to stiffen, add one square of grated chocolate, and as soon as mixed and the frosting is set, spread it over the cake. For a children's party, the star may be outlined with candies.

HONEYCOMB PUDDING.—One cup chopped suet, one cup chopped raisins, one cup sour milk, one cup molasses, one teaspoon soda, one teaspoon salt, clove and nutmeg for spice, flour enough for stiff batter. Steam two and one-half hours.

SAUCE.—One pint hot water, two-thirds cup sugar, little strong vinegar, small piece of butter, flavor with nutmeg. Thicken with flour.

VEGETABLE COMBINATION WITH CREAM SAUCE.—Drain one can of peas and put into double boiler until very hot. Scrape carrots, slice thin, cover with boiling water and cook until soft. Add boiling water from time to time if necessary, but it should be kept low during the last half of cooking, and the stew-pan set back where the water will all cook away without the carrots sticking. Cut turnips that are free from coarse fiber into cubes and cook until tender. Salt both carrots and turnips when about half done. To one can of pease use the same amount of turnip and as much again of carrot. Mix together and pour over the vegetables a cream sauce made by warming one tablespoon of butter and stirring in one rounding tablespoon of flour. Gradually add one and a half cup of thin hot cream while rapidly stirring.

SMOTHERED BEEFSTEAK.—Take one large thin slice of steak from upper part of round. Lay meat out smoothly and cover with a dressing made of one cup of bread-crumbs, half a teaspoon of salt, one-quarter teaspoon pepper, one tablespoon butter, one teaspoon sage and same of summer savory and enough milk to moisten. Roll meat carefully and tie securely with string. In kettle or large stew-pan fry a few slices of pork and into the fat put the roll of beef and let it brown on all sides. Then add one cup of water and stew until tender. When cooked sufficiently, remove the meat, thicken the gravy with flour and turn it over meat. To be cut in slices.

PRUNE MARMALADE.—Wash prunes in warm water and then set in a stew-pan, adding a little over a pint of water to each pound of prunes. Let simmer gently three or four hours or until the juice is thick. To every three pounds of prunes add the juice of one lemon and half the peel. Rub the prunes through a colander to remove the stones and put the pulp in dish and let cook until thick. Put in jars and seal.

CARROT MARMALADE.—Wash and scrape carrots enough to make four cupfuls after being put through food chopper. Put in porcelain-lined kettle with half the amount of water and let cook slowly nearly half an hour or until the water is boiled away. Then add one and three-quarters cup of sugar and let cook slowly one hour. Before removing from fire, add three tablespoons lemon juice and a little salt. Pour into jelly tumblers and cover with melted paraffin.—E. M. M., San Antonio, Texas.

LADY BALTIMORE CAKE.—Cream one-half pound of sugar together with one-quarter pound of butter. When smooth, add one-half cup of sweet milk slowly, then stir in one-half pound of cake flour into which has been put one and one-half teaspoon of Royal baking powder. Flavor with one teaspoon vanilla extract, and at the very last fold in the whites of four eggs beaten very stiff. After putting the egg whites in do not stir the batter more than sufficiently to fold in the eggs. Bake in a quick oven for 25 minutes.

FILLING.—Boil one cup of powdered sugar with one-quarter cup of water for five minutes. Beat up the yolks of two eggs and into them stir the boiling syrup. Bring to a quick boil and remove from stove, add one-half teaspoon vanilla extract. This should be a pretty yellow color. Spread between the layers of cake.

SWEET PEPPER CATSUP.—Seed one-half gallon sweet red peppers, add one gallon vinegar, one quart of water, one cup of sugar, one cup of garlic, one tablespoon of salt, two tablespoons cloves, allspice, cinnamon, black pepper. The spices should be tied in a cloth and put in with other ingredients. Boil this mixture until tender, which will reduce the quantity about half, and mash through a sieve. Bottle and seal while hot. This is better than tomato catsup to put on vegetables and meat.—MRS. GOSS CLAYTON, Baker, La.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton, born rich, dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Upon her death there is left forty pounds a year. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; she has no faith in him, and finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unhappy. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis'. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman. He does not explain but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him.

CHAPTER V.

A VOICE AT MIDNIGHT.

THE new maid as she performed her few duties quietly and well almost began to think in the next few days that Gillian's imagination had led her astray. The household seemed so ordinary, its routine so exactly conventional and proper. Mr. Marchmont and his ward drove out every afternoon; paid visits; had the best people of the county to tea and dinner; and, clear-eyed as she was, Jacqueline saw nothing to lead her to suppose that the master was on anything but the usual terms with his upper servants.

She stood in her sewing-room one afternoon when Gillian was busy with visitors, and looked out at the wintry sky with eyes that did not see.

"This business won't do!" she said to herself briskly. "Either there is something wrong, or there isn't, and I'm going to find out. If Gill is right and not morbid, then we're off; even if I have to borrow ten pounds from"—her face grew hot under the bleach—"Lesard!" A longing cry the name sounded, for she had said it aloud under her breath. "Oh, if he were here, he would see it all in a minute! And Gill must be right, if a hard-headed man like that thinks as he does about Marchmont."

She turned briskly from the window, and—not without uneasiness—marched straight to the housekeeper's room.

"Wait a minute!" cried an annoyed voice. "Oh, it's you, James! What do you want?"

"I beg your pardon, madam, for disturbing you"—how Gillian would have gazed if she had seen the deferential manner, heard the subdued voice!—"but if you would be so good as to speak to the laundry-maid! These handkerchiefs of Miss Hamilton's," displaying two morsels of lace, "are being ruined. Or perhaps you would like me to do them up in future."

"Torn, are they?" with a perfunctory glance at a ruined handkerchief. "Careless! All right, I'll speak to her. Come in!"

The housekeeper was turning about in front of the chimney mirror with an air of annoyance that might have become a duchess. She was arrayed in a purple velvet gown, whose magnificence nearly startled the lady's-maid into an exclamation. A housekeeper in velvet trimmed with jewel embroidery! Jacqueline's face grew perfectly impassive.

"Shut the door tight!" cried Mrs. Gibbs crossly. "I don't want every servant in the house to see me trying on my new gown."

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Gibbs," the maid turned to the door.

"Oh, you don't matter!" suddenly mindful of those recommendations. "I'm—she laughed—"I'm going to wear this gown to my sister's wedding. Do you understand?"

Jacky's heart beat faster. Why did she not matter? And why did the woman all but wink at her?

"It's very suitable," she returned slowly, "and a lovely dress. But it doesn't fit you."

For the sumptuous gown had an extraordinary look of having been made for a wearer both taller and slighter.

"They don't always," the housekeeper said crossly. "Dressmakers aren't to be relied on." Something made Jacky smile, and Mrs. Gibbs smiled, too, her hard mouth relaxing.

"I can alter that dress, if you like," said Jacky, examining it.

"Oh, will you? That's a good sort! But"—it was a curious question to ask a lady's maid—"are you sure you know how?"

"Oh, yes, madam! It's my trade," returned Jacky demurely. She pulled a pair of scissors from her belt and deftly eased the gathering of the vest of the lilac silk, sewn with amethysts. She had kept her face bent over the work as she ripped off the collar and cut the gown out at the neck. What did Gibbs mean? Could it be that she knew? The quick fingers faltered for a second as she glanced up, to see Mrs. Gibbs watching her in wonder.

"Now if you will slip it on, madam," with her best business air. But she was careful not to let her fingers, that were ice cold with fear of detection touch the housekeeper's strong, white throat.

"Why, it's a different thing!" cried that lady joyfully. "You certainly do know your trade, wherever you learned it," significantly. "I didn't expect it, from your references."

Fright made the girl perfectly steady; there was not a trace of comprehension in face or voice as she answered, standing off to survey her alterations:

"I have always given satisfaction; I hope I can please you, too."

"Oh, don't be huffy!" Mrs. Gibbs in high good humor surveyed her buxom figure in the glorious raiment that was no longer excruciating to her flesh. "Just sew that firm for me—that's a good girl. I've got silk to match. And then we'll have a cup of tea."

It was just what the maid wanted, for she must find out what was meant by the hints about her references.

"She doesn't think I'm a real lady's-maid, I'm certain," she pondered as her fingers flew in Mrs. Gibbs' service. "But I believe that is lucky, for she won't wonder so much at my slips. And I know she doesn't suspect my real secret for one minute." Her brow puckered with perplexity, for, who and what, then, did the housekeeper think she was?

But there were no more remarks on the subject. Perhaps Mr. Marchmont's warning had occurred to Mrs. Gibbs.

"You're going away tomorrow—you and Miss Hamilton and Mr. Marchmont," she observed affably, as they drank their tea. "How will you like that?"

"It doesn't matter to me, much. But, are you sure? My mistress has not said anything."

"You're going, all right."

"Where to?"

"Sir Simon Wellford's—ten miles off. He's got a grand party there, I hear—duchesses and what not." She kept her eyes on Jacky's face with a curious look of admiration.

"What wouldn't I give to carry things off like her!" she thought as the girl departed in time to dress her mistress for dinner. "She's the best I ever saw, and so I'll tell Marchmont."

"Jacky, we're going to spend a week at Sir Simon Wellford's!" cried Gillian uncomfortably. "I'm to take you. Do you think you can stand it? You may have to dine with the servants."

"That's not going to hurt me," composedly. "I knew we were going. Mrs. Gibbs just told me. You should see the dress I caught her in, Gill; purple velvet. It was dyed, though, for the purple came off my fingers when I touched it."

"You didn't touch that horrid wretch!" angrily.

"I did, indeed, my dear! I altered her gown for her most skillfully."

"Oh, Jacky!" groaned the other, dropping her brush. "I hate to think of the position I've got you into."

"You needn't. I'm enjoying myself," a trifle enigmatically. "Gill, who's Sir Simon Wellford?"

"A nice old man, with a hateful wife. I shouldn't mind it a bit if she lost her jewels. The last time we went on a visit the house was robbed, you remember! I hope there won't be any more burglaries. Lord Hollis was here just now, and he says they haven't found a trace of the thieves."

"They never seem to nowadays," returned Jacky idly.

"If they're going to try this house, I hope they'll do it while we are gone." Gillian was fastening her pearls carefully. "I'm terrified of burglars, Jacky; and Lady Hollis was nearly killed, you know." But Jacky had turned away.

"They won't come," she said vaguely. What was that Lesard had said about 'rubbishing stories of burglars'? She started as the words came to her mind.

"No burglars are going to trouble Mr. Paul Marchmont." The contemptuous ring of his voice was plain to her memory.

"Now I wonder why!" thought the red-haired maid blankly, as she tossed sleeplessly in her bed that night, and struggled to solve the problems that were too many for cleverer people than she. "I wonder why!"

A slight noise, directly under her window, made her sit up in the dark and listen. There were footsteps on the gravel; not especially cautious footsteps, either, for the crunch of pebbles had sounded loud in the quiet. Someone whistled, as if in idleness, a bar of "I Want You, Ma Honey." The sound brought a lump to the girl's throat. That tune reminded her of Lesard. He had a way of singing the refrain, with his gray eyes on her face; his voice very low, very sweet. The sound of the air as it reached her made her start out of bed and steal over to the window.

It was bright moonlight as she peered through the shutters, but she could see only the burning ends of two cigarettes in the shadow by a door that was never used. Whoever was there, though, was hidden; but she could hear what sounded like the grating of a key in a lock. A man's voice swore indistinctly.

"I'll open it," said another voice. Every clear-cut syllable seemed to ring in her ears. She held tight to the window-frame, her heart leaping. For she knew the voice; every careless tone of it, every inflection, was dear to her.

With fingers that shook with frantic haste, she put on her dress, her stockings.

"He must want me; there isn't anything else that could bring him to this house!" she thought, fumbling breathlessly at her collar in the dark.

"But why does he come at night? And who has he with him? They had a key, too! I can't understand it."

Shoes in hand, she stole through the sewing-room, out into the dark corridors that led to the main part of the house. At the swinging baize doors she stopped, to let her breath come back to her. Stern common sense came back, too, and forbade her to believe her own ears.

It could not have been Lesard's voice she had heard under her window at midnight! She must have been dreaming.

Yet his own words came back to her:

"I'll go down to that neighborhood if you're there, but I wouldn't like to go into that brute's house."

If he meant the second half of that sentence, how could he have entered that house just now, with a pass-key, familiarly, as of old habit?

"If it wasn't Lesard, I don't know my own name." She bit her lip sharply. "I'll go out and find out, anyhow. He said to let him know if there was trouble. Perhaps there's trouble now, and he's come down to see me through it."

She crept down the servants' staircase, noiselessly, not certain where to go. What a fool she was! Why! that door must lead directly into the passage under her own room, but as to what rooms opened on it she was utterly ignorant.

The passage was dark when she reached it, not a door was open, and yet from somewhere there came the low murmur of voices. Jacky listened with all her ears, but she could not distinguish one voice from the other; could not be sure even how many there were, or if one were Marchmont's.

"I must just continue on this nice stone floor in my stockings till I sneeze—or they come out and catch me!" she thought angrily. For a moment she dismissed that crazy idea that it had been Lesard's voice she heard, as she looked about in the gloom for a hiding place. There was not a thing visible in the darkness but the walls and the dim outline of the stairway down which she had come. She hid herself swiftly under the turn of it, squeezing her slim young shape in under the steps, just in time, for a woman ran down them, her high-heeled shoes clicking.

It was Mrs. Gibbs, and she knocked at a door. Jacky, crouching in the shadows, bent double. She had reason to, if she had known it. Her life hung on nothing but the question as to whether Mrs. Gibbs entered that room or not.

"It's me," said the housekeeper in an angry whisper. "Are you going to keep me up all night?"

Somebody laughed, and every nerve in Jacky Hamilton's body seemed to tighten.

"We don't want you." Marchmont's voice came through the door. "You can go to bed. There's nothing new."

The girl under the stairs did not know that Death had his finger on her in the pause before Marchmont spoke. If she had, perhaps she would have stayed motionless, just the same, that she might know who was in that room.

The housekeeper's steps died away and Jacky stood up to ease her aching body; only to drop flat and noiseless to the floor.

The door was opening! Whoever was in there was coming out.

The oblong of light from the doorway seemed to shine straight on her; it dazzled her, but she was so low that she was safe. She stared at the three men in the passage in breathless scrutiny.

One was Marchmont, the other two wore the corduroy and gaiters of gamekeepers, but she knew they were not simply keepers come at this hour to speak to their master. For, though one was a stranger to her, a rough-looking, bullet-headed boy, the other—she shut her eyes as he turned so that the light fell on his keen, clear face—shut them so that the memory of him should not be stamped on her brain forever.

For the other man was Lesard; and his arm was slipped through Marchmont's familiarly. Lesard, who was unwilling to enter "that brute's house!"

CHAPTER VI.

PURPLE VELVET.

As in a dream Miss Hamilton's maid got her mistress ready for the week's visit to Sir Simon and Lady Wellford. So pale she was that she scarcely needed "Mrs. Ray's Face Bleach" to make her look powder-white. She moved mechanically from wardrobe to boxes with Gillian's clothes, Lesard's own words to her ringing in her brain: "Promise to trust me, whatever happens! You're loyal enough—you may need to be loyal to me; don't forget I warned you."

Thank God, he had warned her! Only that was keeping Jacky Hamilton's heart up as she folded those silks and laces she hated to see Gillian wear.

"That must have been what he meant," she thought bravely; "that I might see him do queer things. And how do I know? He might have been fighting my battles and Gill's. I will trust him—I must. I won't let anything turn me from him."

Yet even as she thought it, there seemed an undercurrent in her brain, louder, stronger, truer than those thoughts she was forcing herself to think.

How did he come to have a key? Why was he not dressed in his own clothes? Why did he take the arm of the man he said he loathed? Most of all, why did he come to this house, where he had warned her not to stay, without apparently so much as once thinking of her? He could not have forgotten—no man could have forgotten—that the girl he loved was in such a place.

He had spoken to Marchmont, too, each careless word like a knife at the heart of the unseen listener.

"Well, here's luck to the ball," he had said, yawning; "we'll all be there. Good night. Come on, Billy," and he and his companion had departed as they came.

It was all perfectly inexplicable. And it was as well that she could not know, as she mused over it, that if Mrs. Gibbs had entered that room and extolled the new maid whom "Billy" was supposed to have sent to that gentleman, there would have been no wondering over anything for Jacky Hamilton, who had altered a velvet gown. She said nothing to Gillian, for this was her puzzle, and not her sister's. She had never spoken of Lesard, she was not going to begin now. Chilly and faint-hearted, she got out of the pony-cart which had conveyed her to Wellford house in the wake of the Victoria which carried Gillian and Mr. Marchmont.

It was a great modern house, not at all like the old picturesque home of her father's that Marchmont had taken. Built of brick, it glittered from far off with the lights in its many French windows, and even in the dusk she could see that it fairly bristled with porticoes and balconies.

She followed the kindly housemaid through long passages, shining with white enamel paint and comfortable with red carpeting. Electric lights were everywhere, and a hothouse warmth that was grateful to her chilled frame.

"We've forty people staying in the house; it's her ladyship's last party for the winter," said the housemaid affably. "This room is yours, next your young lady," throwing open a door of a fair-sized room, evidently a dressing-room for it led into a great chamber, softly lit, and hung, with a fire shining on its luxury.

"Thank goodness," said Jacky, as Gillian entered ten minutes later, "we're together!" She stooped to warm her perished hands at the cheerful fire, and Gillian saw that she was crying. Jacky, who never cried!

"My dear, my dear," the elder sister cried, "is it going to be too hard for you? Shall I pretend you're ill and have you sent home?"

"It isn't that." Jacky wiped the tears from her face, and stood strangely haggard in her streaked make-up. "It's a queer sort of feeling I have about this house. I feel as if it were lucky to be here."

Miss Hamilton locked the door. Then, without more words, put her maid into the easiest chair and gave her a cup of tea from the tray that stood beside the fire.

"Thank goodness, we arrived late and Lady Wellford had to send my tea up," she remarked. "You're tired out."

"It's a convenience, certainly," Jacky answered more cheerfully, feeling a little ashamed of her tears. "But I mean it, Gill; I feel as if something were going to happen."

"Don't, Jacky!"

"Keep your eyes open downstairs"—something in the streaked paint on the girl's face made her tragic—"and I will keep mine open among the other grand lady's-maids. If you notice anything, come and tell me."

"Jacky," Gillian was wild eyed, "you are dreaming! Are you afraid of another burglary or what?"

"I don't know what I'm afraid of," desperately; "only I'm afraid."

"There can't be any reason, in a great house like this," with forced cheerfulness. "Jacky, I think—I knew I had something to tell you. They're going to have a ball, a great big masked ball, tomorrow night, and you can have one of my evening dresses and a domino and come down and see the fun."

"A ball!" Jacqueline, bolt upright, was staring at her. "A masked ball!" she repeated.

Gillian nodded, beginning to dress for dinner.

"It will be such fun and quite safe. You can come with me and see everybody. There will be so many people that an extra will never be noticed. Why, anyone might come to it! You will be able to get a little fun; it will be a relief from the odious part you have to play."

But Jacqueline did not hear her.

That was what Lesard had meant! "The ball, we'll all be there." The words chimed in oddly with Gillian's "anyone might come."

"I'll make two dominoes," she said, and her sharp breathing drew in her nostrils. "If I dare, I'll go down."

She would dare. If Lesard meant to be at that ball she must see him, speak to him, find out what this midnight masquerading of his meant. In spite of her suspicions, her face was radiant with a desperate joy as she repainted it to face her fellow-servants. She would trust him, and tomorrow night would see everything put straight. There was only one man in the world for Jacky Hamilton, and to doubt him was to have grief for her bedfellow, ashes for her meat and drink.

Gillian was lovely as she went downstairs, all ivory satin and chiffon, her collar of pearls a whiter and fairer than her throat. Jacky—who Lady Wellford's own maid, a stout French woman—hung over the banisters and watched her going in to dinner in the long procession of ladies in satins and diamonds. Gillian was on the arm of a good-looking, fair man, very tall, very distinguished, who was looking down at her with pleasure at her beauty. But Gillian seemed to have no eyes for him. She was paler than Jacky had ever seen her, and her face was set like a hard mask of endurance.

That changed face deepened the uneasiness in Jacky's heart as she craned over the banisters, scrutinizing each man passing beneath her. But

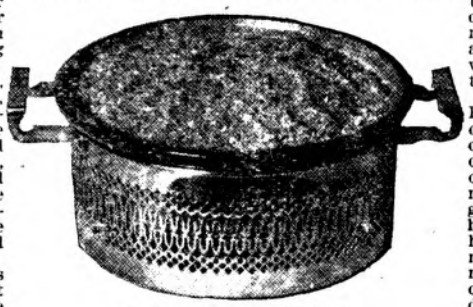
COOKING FOR THANKSGIVING

ROAST TURKEY

By Violet Marsh



Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE old-fashioned Thanksgiving dinner which closely follows the harvest season is as much a custom today as it was when our forefathers, with exuberant thankfulness, made a religious rite of the feast.

In these days of plenty it would be very difficult to understand the depth of that spirit of thankfulness, when, after a season of toil and drudgery, of hope mingled with anxiety and prayerful watching, the early settler and his good helpmeet, beheld a harvest that filled pantry and cellar, hay loft and grain bin and brought the assurance that neither man nor beast under their shelter would suffer from hunger during the coming winter.

Centuries have passed, the crops are bountiful, yet the housewife is planning very much the same old-fashioned feast as did her great-grandmother, because of its unrivaled excellence, and because the traditional Thanksgiving dinner will ever be observed by true-blooded Americans.

As a nation on this great day, we shall cast aside all thought of the balanced meal and agree with the small boy who declared, "I'd ruther eat what I'd ruther." Yes, we shall sin dietically and take the chance of laughter and good cheer stimulating the processes of digestion when we top pie and cheese with pudding, nuts, raisins and sweet cider.

BAKED VIRGINIA PUDDING.

Typical Thanksgiving Dishes

ROAST TURKEY.—Loosely twist old newspaper, place in a pan, light, and hold the turkey over the flame until the hairs and down are singed off. Hold the turkey firmly and keep rapidly turning in all positions so that the skin will not be dried in places. The skin of the turkey should be kept unbroken but if any openings do appear draw the skin together and sew with coarse thread. Cut off the head, make an incision well below the breast-bone, insert the hand and draw out the entrails unbroken, then the gizzard, heart and liver; cut away the gall bladder. The lungs, which are red and of a spongy consistency, will be found on either side of the back-bone close to the ribs, and the kidneys in hollows near the end of the back-bone. Both lungs and kidneys must be thoroughly removed as a very small remaining portion will impart a bitter flavor. Draw the neck skin down and remove the windpipe and crop. Cut away the oil bag. Quickly wash inside and outside with tepid water and a little good soap. Rinse and wipe dry. Stuff, rub all over with salt and equal parts of butter and flour creamed together. Sprinkle a little dry flour on the bottom of the baker and on this lay leaves of extra fat that have been removed from turkey. Add three-fourths cup of boiling water. Substitute butter for fat if the turkey is lean. Lay the turkey on the rack, cover with a large and deep inverted pan unless a regulation double baker is used. Place in a hot oven for twenty minutes, then reduce the heat to moderate, baste frequently if cooked in open pan, and add water as needed. An eight-pound turkey should cook about three hours.

GRAVY WITH GIBLETS.

CHESTNUT STUFFING.—Shell one quart of large chestnuts, cover with boiling water and remove the brown skins. Boil soft in lightly salted water. Care should be taken not to use too much water so that it may be nearly cooked away when the chestnuts are soft. Mash into the water and simmer down if necessary. Add sufficient bread-crumbs to thicken (about two cups), a very little pepper, one-third cup of butter and one or two tablespoons of heavy cream. Cracker-crumbs may be used, and a delicious flavor is obtained by cooking half-a-cup of chopped celery with the chestnuts.

CRACKER STUFFING.—Split three common crackers, and very gradually add boiling water until they are moistened. Add one-third cup of melted butter, and season with salt, pepper and sage, or prepared poultry dressing.

GRAVY WITH GIBLETS.—The heart, liver and gizzard are cleaned, put into one pint of water and boiled until tender. Remove from liquor and chop fine. Pour the drippings from the pan in which the turkey is cooked. Skim off the fat that quickly rises to the top, and return about five tablespoons of it to the pan. Heat and smooth in five tablespoons of dry flour, and stir rapidly until a light brown. Gradually add the liquor from the pan, and that from the giblets. Season with salt and pepper and cook until thickened to the right consistency. Add chopped giblets. If the neck of turkey and tip ends of wings are removed they should be cooked with the giblets.

CRANBERRY JELLY.—Wash one quart of cranberries and put into a porcelain-lined stew-pan with one and one-half cup of boiling water. Cook rapidly, and stir frequently to help break them. Cook about ten minutes or until well broken and soft. Strain. Add two cups of sugar and cook about ten minutes longer.

CHILI SAUCE.—Remove the seeds from one green pepper and one red pepper and chop fine with two good-sized onions. Peel and cut into pieces ten large tomatoes. Add one and one-quarter level tablespoon of salt, one-half cup of brown sugar and three cups of vinegar. Into a muslin bag put one and three-fourths level teaspoons each of grated nutmeg and clove, two teaspoons of cinnamon and one-half teaspoon of allspice and tie securely, leaving ample room for the spice to swell. Very slowly bring to a boil, set back and simmer until the desired consistency. Remove the bag of spice and bottle.

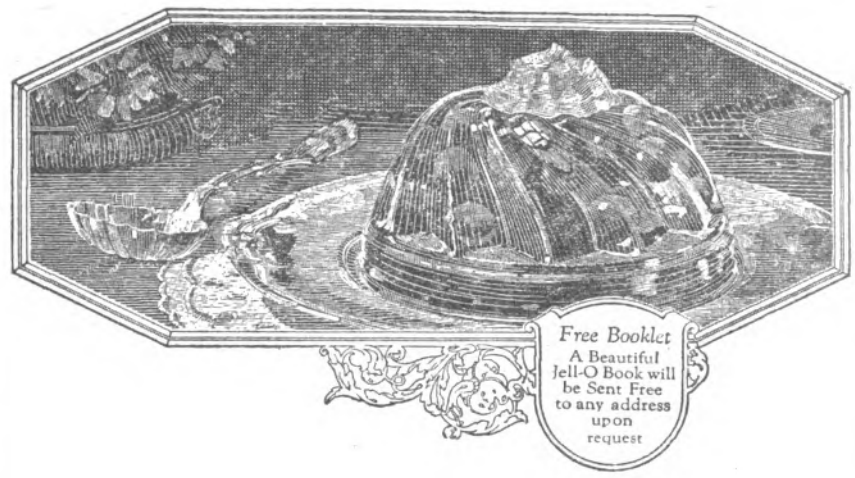
FILLING FOR PUMPKIN PIE.—Prepare pumpkin as described for canning in this column. Use one and one-half cup to a pie and add three-fourths cup of brown sugar, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-third teaspoon of ginger, one teaspoon of cinnamon, a little grated lemon rind, and two eggs slightly beaten. Beat hard until well blended, then gradually add two cups of scalding hot rich milk. Bake in a moderate oven until brown which should take about two hours.

OLD-FASHIONED PLUM PUDDING.—Soak two cups of fine bread-crumbs in one quart of rich milk one-half hour, then add one scant tablespoon of molasses, one-half cup of granulated sugar, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of nutmeg, one teaspoon of cinnamon, a pinch of clove, one-half teaspoon of soda dissolved in one-fourth cup of cold milk, two tablespoons of thick cream and two large well-beaten eggs. Beat well then add one cup of seedless raisins and one cup of good currants (wash the fruit by pouring boiling water over it and letting it stand ten minutes, then rinsing through several waters and draining well. Always skim out the fruit so that any grit will be left in the bottom of the pan). Pour the mixture into a buttered pudding dish and place in a moderate oven. Stir occasionally as the fruit will settle at first. When the pudding has thickened sufficiently to hold up the fruit, cover and bake in a very slow oven five hours. Delicious hot or cold. Serve with hard sauce or sweetened whip cream.

BAKED VIRGINIA PUDDING.—Bring three cups of milk to a scald in a double boiler, then gradually stir in one-half cup of corn-meal wet with one cup of cold milk. Cook fifteen minutes, add half-a-cup of finely chopped suet, one cup of molasses, one-half cup of sugar, one cup of skinned and stoned dates cut into coarse pieces, one-half teaspoon of ginger, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon and one-half teaspoon of salt. Pour into a buttered pudding dish and bake in a very slow oven four and a half hours.

THANKSGIVING PUDDING.—Three cups of sifted flour, one and one-half even teaspoons of salt, one teaspoon of cinnamon, one-half teaspoon of nutmeg and one-fourth teaspoon of clove sifted together several times. Add to the dry mixture one cup of seedless or seeded raisins, one-third cup of currants, one-third cup of chopped dates and one-third cup of blanched almonds chopped fine. Put three-fourths cup of suet through the food chopper and mix with one cup of good molasses and one cup of milk and add to the flour and fruit. Beat hard until smooth. Pour into a pudding tin or pail that will cover tightly. It should not be over two-thirds full. Steam four hours, taking care that the water does not stop boiling at any time.

PUDDING SAUCE.—Bring to a boil one cup of hot water, two thirds cup of sugar, the juice of half a lemon and a little grated orange rind. Thicken with one slightly rounded tablespoon of corn-starch wet with one-third cup of cold water and slowly cook for five minutes. Beat in two tablespoons of butter and pour the hot mixture over two well-beaten egg yolks, return to stew-pan and cook three minutes, then add the beaten whites and beat with the egg beater until light. Serve.



JEWISH FRUIT CAKE.—Sift together several times one scant half cup of sifted flour, four level teaspoons of corn-starch and one rounding teaspoon of baking powder. Prepare one pound of dates by removing the skins and stones and cutting into coarse pieces, and one-half pound of English walnut meats broken into several pieces. Beat three egg yolks, add one-half cup of granulated sugar, and with the egg beater beat until very light and creamy. Now beat in the flour, then add the beaten whites and the dates and nuts. Spread about one inch thick in pan, and bake very slowly until brown and well shrunken around the edges. When cold, cut into bars. This cake will keep indefinitely in a tight tin box.

THANKSGIVING PUDDING.

GOOD DOUGHNUTS.—Beat one egg until light, then beat in one cup of granulated sugar, add one scant teaspoon of salt, one-fourth teaspoon of nutmeg, one tablespoon of softened butter and beat until light and creamy with one scant cup of whole sweet milk, using the egg beater. Sift one teaspoon of cream of tartar and one-half teaspoon of soda with three cups of sifted flour, or use one even tablespoon of baking powder in place of cream of tartar and soda. Gradually beat in the flour, adding more if necessary to Many Reasons for Jell-O.

SCIENTISTS, through intensive research and countless experiments, have discovered long since, that sweets are essential and important factors in the well being of every normal human being; that to them the body is indebted for its inner heat, its energy, and its activity.

Nutrition experts and dietists are agreed that the dessert is of as great value in the perfectly balanced meal as the more hearty dishes.

Housewives declare there is no food product which so adequately answers the requirements of a well planned menu as JELL-O, and furthermore they select JELL-O for their first choice in dessert dishes for the following reasons:

It is equally suited to the needs and appetites of both children and adults.

It is the one dessert of which the family never tires.

It is the most easily prepared of all sweet dishes.

It may be varied in so many delectable ways that a different, tempting dessert is possible every day.

It is delightful and satisfying in both summer and winter.

It is always available no matter where one may be located and keeps perfectly if one desires to buy in quantity.

It combines deliciously with fruits, nuts, cream and other tempting and nourishing accessories.

It is appropriate for the simple every day meal or for the elaborate company menu.

It is convenient, inexpensive and wholesome.

Every Jell-O package has complete instructions on how to make up plain Jell-O. It is made in a minute by adding the contents of the package to exactly one pint of boiling water and then cooling the mixture. Below are carefully worked-out recipes covering more elaborate dishes, but no recipe is too difficult to be made up by the most inexperienced housekeeper. Each one of them is offered as being in accord with the idea of "the easy Jell-O way."

JELL-O AND BAKED APPLES

Bake six medium-sized or small apples with cores filled with brown sugar and chopped nuts. When cold arrange the apples in a pan and cover them with Raspberry Jell-O (one package dissolved in a pint of boiling water). After the Jell-O has set, cut into squares, using a knife dipped in hot water, and serve with whipped cream. Or place each apple in a cup and pour the Jell-O over.

PLUM PUDDING

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water, and while it is still hot stir in three-fourths cup Grape Nuts or one cup coarse dried and browned bread crumbs, three-fourths cup stoned raisins, three-fourths cup English walnut meats, three-fourths cup cooked prunes and one-fourth cup citron—all cut fine; one-half teaspoonful cinnamon, one-fourth teaspoonful cloves. Salt to taste. Mix and let harden. Serve with whipped cream or pudding sauce.

GLORIFIED RICE

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in half a pint of boiling water. Add one-half pint of canned pineapple juice or any fruit juice. When a cold liquid, whip to the consistency of heavy whipped cream. Have two cups of cold boiled rice cooked dry. Fold the rice into the whipped Jell-O. Add one cup whipped cream, four tablespoonfuls sugar, and salt to taste. Set in a cold place to harden.

MARION HARLAND'S PRUNE WHIP

Dissolve one package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water and set it aside until it begins to thicken. Then beat with an egg-beater until it reaches the consistency of whipped cream. Stir in one cup of chopped prunes which have been stewed until very tender. Very much better if one cup whipped cream is added. Turn into mold to harden. Add more sugar to the water in which they were cooked, and boil this down to a thick syrup. When cold, pour it about the base of the dessert, after you have turned it out, and arrange whole prunes as a garnish.

SNOW PUDDING

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water. When cold and still liquid whip with an egg-beater to consistency of whipped cream. Let stand till firm and then pile it by spoonfuls into sherbet glasses and serve with custard flavored with grated rind of fresh lemon.

APPLE SNOW JELL-O

Dissolve a package of Strawberry Jell-O in a pint of boiling water. When partly cold turn into sherbet glasses, filling three-quarters full. When firm pile Apple Snow on top. To make Apple Snow, dissolve one-half package of Lemon Jell-O in half a pint of boiling water. When cool whip to consistency of thick whipped cream. Then add one grated apple and four tablespoonfuls of sugar.

Cubby Bear Leaves Home

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"I HAVE been talking with Henry, the Hawk, today," Squilly Porcupine told Cubby Bear, "and it makes me feel restless."

"Why?" asked Cubby. "What did he say to you?"

"Oh, he said he could never live such a slow, dull life as we forest animals do," answered Squilly. "And he told me of his long, beautiful flights, and the wonderful sights he has seen. It makes me want to go roving, too. But on my four slow feet I could never go as far as he does, and being down on the ground I could not see half that he can, up in the air."

Then Squilly talked along, telling all he could remember of Henry Hawk's stories.

"Why, oh, why have I no wings!" he moaned. "It is the same with you, too, Cubby Bear! How can you be as happy as you are?"

"Perhaps I shall not be, now you have told me all the hawk has done, the places where he has been, and the sights he has seen. I wish, oh, I wish, that I might go far, far away from this old forest. As Henry said, it is a stupid place to live!"

Cubby Bear walked slowly homeward, all the while looking down at the ground. He reached home just as Grandma Bear and Mamma Bruin were sitting down to a nice dinner of boiled ferns. He took his place at the table, but did not feel like eating.

"Have some of these nice greens, Cubby Bear," urged Mamma Bruin.

"No," he refused, then added, as an afterthought, "Thank you."

"You do not know how good they are," Grandma Bear told him. "Fern greens are the best of any kind, but they must be picked at just the right time. I went out and picked these myself, I wanted you to help me, but could not find you. You know how they grow, don't you? All rolled up neatly, they are, at first, just as your Mamma Bruin rolls up her tape-measure. Then, as they grow, they unroll themselves in long fern-fronds of pale green, ever so pretty. But it's when they are rolled up tightly, all young and fresh and tender, that I pick them for greens. Have some!"

"No, thank you," repeated Cubby.

"You are not sick, are you?" asked Mamma Bruin, laying her paw on his head. "You have always liked greens before."

Cubby Bear wrinkled his little black nose disdainfully.

"I am sure they are not as nice as the things Henry Hawk finds to eat when he is off on his travels," he said. "Oh, Mamma Bruin! I am sick of this forest, and I am sick of greens—and of this house—and of seeing the same things and the same animals day after day—and walking in the same paths! I want wings, like Henry Hawk, and Shinyblack Crow, and Edric Eagle!"

Mamma Bruin seemed to have forgotten her dinner, and looked at her little son with troubled eyes.

"Why, Cubby Bear! What has made you feel like this? Have you been talking with Henry Hawk, the rover?"

"No, but Squilly Porcupine has, and he is unhappy, too. I cannot have wings, but I am going away—as far as my feet will carry me!" Cubby rose from the table, and stood by the window, scowling darkly.

"Oh, no! How could I let you go, Cubby Bear?" asked Mamma Bruin.

Cubby began to weep, stormily.

"You just want to keep me here, where I can never have any fun!" he sobbed.

Grandma Bear was still calmly eating greens.

"If he wants to go, let him," she advised, "and see what fun he can find."

"I shall never be happy till I do," Cubby said.

"Then go," Mamma Bruin told him sadly, and kissed him on the forehead.

Cubby left the house, and started off down the familiar path toward the Big Brook.

"I wish I could find Henry Hawk," he thought. "He would tell me where to go to have a good time. If Squilly Porcupine were not such a slow walker, I would take him with me, but I shall have a better time alone, not having to wait for him."

When he reached the Big Brook, he stood watching the running water for a while.

"The brook runs always away and away!" he thought. "I will follow it and see where it goes."

So he went along, walking by the bank where he could, pushing his way through close-growing bushes, clambering over rocks. And ever Big Brook murmured its low song, and rippled along its way. Sometimes Cubby waded in the cool water for a little distance when the bank was too rough.

After a while the brook widened into a pond, and he came to the dam Busy Beaver and Brother Binney Beaver had built of small logs which they had cut down with their long, strong teeth. At the edge of the water was the beavers' lodge, or house. Busy Beaver was paddling about in the water.

"How do you do, Cubby Bear?" he asked. "Did you come to play with me? I will call Brother Binney, and we will have a fine time splashing in the water!"

"No, do not call him," replied Cubby, "for I cannot stop. I am going away from home—away from the forest—away from everything I have ever seen. Good by!" And he hurried on.

In mid-afternoon he was picking some new little checkerberry leaves which grew on a small hillock. He liked the sharp flavor, and ate them eagerly.

All at once he was startled by hearing a loud "Bang-bang!"

He dropped his checkerberry leaves, and put both paws over his ears.

"Oh, oh!" he thought. "What was that? It sounded like the noise the red stick made last Fourth of July, when it fell in the fire!"

As he stood there, shuddering, he heard a sudden rustling among the leaves of a maple tree close by, then a large bird fell to the ground—flop!

Henry, the Hawk!

He did not seem to be having such a beautiful time! He lay still on the ground for a few moments, then crawled under some bushes. Cubby followed him.

"What is the trouble? Are you hurt?" asked Cubby.

Henry scurried in farther among the sheltering bushes.

"HOW DO YOU DO, CUBBY BEAR?" HE ASKED.

"Do not be afraid. It is only Cubby Bear."

"I did not know anyone was near!" Henry exclaimed, crawling out from his hiding place. He looked rumpled and scared, and part of his long tail-feathers were gone.

"Did you hear the loud bang!" asked Cubby Bear.

"Did I hear it!" shrieked Henry Hawk. "I should say I did! Don't you see my tail-feathers are cut off?"

"But——but I don't quite understand," said Cubby. "What cut them off? And why should cutting feathers make such a loud noise?"

"Oh——stupid! You don't know much, do you?" cried Henry angrily.

Cubby did not know how he had offended the hawk, but decided to talk about something else.

"I wanted to find you this afternoon," said Cubby, "and ask you to tell me where to go to have a good time. Squilly Porcupine told me about the beautiful times you have on your travels."

"Go home!" said the hawk, "where you have always had good times, and where your friends love you! That is where I am going—I mean to my own home, not to yours."

"But are you sure you are not too much hurt to go there alone?" asked Cubby. "I would help you!"

"I can go alone," answered the hawk. "But I shall hide here under the bushes for a while first. Hark! do I hear someone coming? Run, Cubby Bear, and I will hide. It might be the man with the gun!"

Cubby ran, as he was told, hardly knowing whether to be afraid or not. What was a gun, anyway?

"I must keep near the Big Brook," he thought, "so I shall not get lost."

After running until he was tired, he stopped to listen. He heard nothing but the song of birds and hum of insects.

"I will lie down and rest," he said to himself, "and then perhaps I will start to go far away again. Or, perhaps——I——may——go——home, as Henry told me."

In the shade of some trees he found a bed of soft moss, a beautiful place to rest. Close by grew a cluster of tiny white violets, and their sweet fragrance came to his nostrils.

A gentle little breeze rustled the leaves above him, singing a lullaby, and Cubby slept.

He dreamed he was floating, away and away and away. Then a soft voice seemed to be whispering in his ear tales of the forest life, and of the good brown earth, and of summer time, though just what the stories were he never could remember later.

"It is time to waken now," the voice murmured. "Open your eyes. The warm summer winds are blowing all about you. Blue sky is above; green trees bend over you, their rustling leaves whisper sweet stories if only you listen closely enough to hear. Beautiful flowers grow for you, and slender green grasses, standing with their roots in the moist earth that gives them life. Oh, happy, happy Cubby Bear, to live in a world so full of beautiful things!"

Cubby sat up and looked around. Where had the sweet whispering voice come from? The rustling leaves? The white violets? Had he been dreaming, there on the mossy bed?

There had been some trouble, he thought—but what? Oh, yes. He had been discontented and angry and cross! But where was his ill-temper now? All gone. Perhaps he had slept it away.

A Cubby Bear who lived in such a beautiful world and had such a good Mamma Bruin to love him, ought to be a very good little Cubby Bear, indeed! And only to think that he had been cross with good Mamma Bruin, and had meant to leave her for always!

He sprang to his feet, and ran—he could not run fast enough to suit him—toward home.

He could not run all the way—it was too far. When he reached home the sun was setting, and pink clouds, gold-edged, were in the western sky. He rushed into the house, and threw his arms around Mamma Bruin's neck.

"I have come back!" he cried joyously. "I am going to live here with you and Grandma Bear!"

"That is my good little Cubby," said Mamma Bruin as she kissed him. "Now have some supper, for you must be hungry."

Grandma Bear was taking a large basket down from the shelf.

"I am going out to pick rolled-up fern heads," she said. "There is nothing better for greens."

"Oh, let me help you pick them," offered Cubby Bear, "and we will have a nice dinner tomorrow."

THIS is the month of bare boughs and gray skies—and also of our national bird and the national sport of politics. And speaking of politics, Billy, through his friendship with Tom McFadden, whose brother is boss of the Seventh Ward, has been getting quite on the inside as to how things are managed in our big town in the interesting and important game of "Vote! Vote! Who's got the Vote?" Among our many-tongued and much-balloted city districts the great vote-chasing game has developed some strange rules—or evasion of rules—and, at what he has heard Tom tell, I know Billy must have raised his right and righteous eyebrow many times and frowned much internally. At any rate, he has, at considerable length, passed on to me tales of what he calls "disgraceful conditions" which he thinks make "democracy a farce and our republic a shaking fabric"—to quote Bill at his gloomiest phrase and his best period! As I have said before, Bill is by rheumatism a pessimist and by heredity and training a born conservative. Book-fed upon Macaulay, the natural trend of his ideas easily develops into doubts of our democratic form of government, its possible endurance, and even its present benefits.

"Uncle Lisha," he said triumphantly to me last night, after reading aloud extracts from an evening paper of large city circulation and headlines, "you'll have to admit, after hearing such stuff, which is bound to influence unthinking voters, that our government works inevitably toward rule by its lowest level. Why, the best brains are swamped and unrepresented in such an expanse of ignorance, mediocrity—and worse!"

"Bill," I said, "to begin with, we are not as much newspaper-governed and influenced as you might think. Recent elections have proved this. Also who the 'best brains' are is a matter always open to argument and judgment. I notice that all who, like you, begin to argue against the demoocratic tradition, always also start in by assuming themselves among these best brains who are so unfortunately cut off from an opportunity to govern! There were many such, I'm sure, ready to jeer at Abe Lincoln as an unlettered rhil-splitter whose clothes fitted strangely.

"I don't have to listen to your arguments, Billy; I have read all you could say before, in thick and thin volumes of pleaders and doubters, and I can read it many times again in pessimistic articles our magazines are printing rather often. Thanks to the planning of our forefathers, who found it necessary, you will remember, to separate themselves from policies framed by an aristocratic government, the best brains in our country are not limited from governing only to the extent that they choose to limit themselves. Too, no development of a governing class, as in aristocratically-controlled countries, has shown itself actually capable of automatically turning forth these best brains, always so fitted, according to the aristocratic tradition, to rule the incapable, unthinking masses. For I would like you, Bill, and some of these democracy-doubters to take notice that when a class-ruled country—England, for example—needs a best brain to get her out of difficulties before which an aristocratic government stands helpless, such a leader springs up in the form of a Lloyd George, the son of a Welsh tailor; or in a Gladstone, whose father was a Glasgow shopkeeper; or a Disraeli, the self-pushed representative of an aristocratically-despised race. The Salisburies and Cecils cut poor figures before these men. You read enough history, Billy, to know that the same sort of instances can be pointed out in other monarchial countries. However achieved, the best government of the people must come from one of themselves. England's only surviving greatness today is because the men who have come forward to save her in great crises are exactly the same sort of men who would have come to the front in our country or in any democracy. Great Britain's saving wisdom has ever been that her ruling class have made use of such men and granted them the power they deserved and which, under a republic, they would have won for themselves. Look back for perhaps two centuries in the history of monarchial Europe and count the leaders of mankind who have been born to the aristocratic purple. Mark the ruin created by crowned imbeciles and those who have had to traditionally serve them in their imbecilities—and then watch in history's pages how the damage done has had to be remedied by some upspringing, outstanding member of the long-suffering 'unthinking' masses.

"Man as man, Billy, is a creature of hope, feeling and search for happiness. He is not at his best when he is but a collection of pedigree, privilege, false education and accumulated selfishness disguised as culture. Any government must have best chance of success when its base is as near as possible to the striving heart of mankind itself, and its functioning representatives not those whose heads are so above their fellows that their feet must rest upon the necks of those they rule."

"Well, Uncle Lisha," said Billy, dissentingly and obstinately, "I don't know but we might as well have feet upon our necks as to have hands always in our pockets. Under an aristocratic form of government those who rule do not have to fatten themselves upon public plunder. With us it's getting worse every year. Why, Tom says——"

"That's all right, Bill," I cut in, with soothing abruptness; "I know all about Tom's brother and the profession of politics as it has developed under our constant increase in wealth, population—and offices. I am not blind nor deaf and I know quite as much about our governmental evils as you do. But the things we suffer from most are not faults to be blamed upon our fundamentals of government. Rather they are fruits of our great growth in wealth, always a danger to a republic, and the fact that our electroate has not been the development of our own normal increase in population. Our city vote today, and much of our rural vote, is congested and affected with elements, interests and ideas all brought to our shores from aristocratically-governed countries and developed there. Remember this when you blame latter-day political evils against democracy itself.

"Let the railers rail and the pessimists prophecy, Bill! I'm going to cut a big slice from the side veranda of a juicy Long Island turkey this Thanksgiving, convinced that I have more to be thankful for than a citizen of any other country on the globe. More than ever today these States are the hope of the world, Billy. Our form of government is a light of liberty set upon a hill. It cannot be hid. Any dwindling of this light is a fatal darkening to the whole earth.

"What Tom McFadden's brother does in the Seventh Ward may be quite as bad as you say, Bill, but——" as I waved a proud oratorical hand in Billy's direction, I saw to my disgust that he had spread the front page of the Brooklyn Bugle over his eyes and was so fast asleep that my voice could only be passing to his ears like the rumble of the distant trollies carrying evening crowds theater- and movie-ward. The real truth is that the only person Bill likes to hear talk is himself!

And now for the letters:

CROHANHURST VIA BEERWAH,
NORTH COAST LINE,
QUEENSLAND, AUSTRALIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Did you ever get a letter from Australia before? Well, here I am! I was born in Minnesota, so I am not an Australian, but I have lived here in the lonely bush for nine years—and I am only fifteen. I am very lonesome here because I have not gone to school since I was ten, and I have no friends. I am writing hoping some kind cousins will write to me. I will exchange stamps with all who write and I will tell them about my country. I would be especially pleased to hear from nature lovers—particularly bird lovers. I belong to a League for protecting native birds, animals and plants. My birthday is the 11th of October. If those who write will tell me their birthdays, I will put them in my birthday book.

I remain, with the best of good wishes,
Your little niece and cousin,
MARJORIE BUCHANAN.

You are evidence, Marjorie, that our Happy Family stretches even to the Antipodes—where I used to imagine folks walking about upside down, like flies on the ceiling. You don't say if you have to walk in this inconvenient fashion, Marjorie; but I fancy not. Doubtless with all these new inventions since I went to school, they have got things arranged so you can move around right side up—just the same as when you lived in Minnesota and before you turned into a lonesome, friendless little bushgirl.

I wish you had told us more about your big island continent, Marjorie, and just what you are doing 'way out there in the bush. All Australians talk about the "bush," and Australia must be a very bushy place. It has always been hard for me to think of the streets of Adelaide, Melbourne and Sidney as being filled with bushes, but it must be so, I suppose,—for I have never heard of a single Australian but what lived amid this wild-sounding "bush." Well, birds like bushes, Marjorie, and so you must find plenty of birds to study, love and protect as you roam about your leafy, bushy home in Queensland. The beautifully plumed Canberra, the wild Beerwah and the timid Perth are all native birds of yours which I would like to see.

Marjorie, I think I had best tell the cousins that they will have to put a five-cent stamp on letters and two-cent stickers on postcards when they write to you—as many of them will. It is a long ways both to Tipperary and the Antipodes, and it takes a lot of postage and miles to bring mail far out in the lonely bush, where the tiny Beerwah sings enchantingly as the sun rises over the pink Pacific.

GRANTS PASS, BOX 147, OREGON.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Hi, oh!—the call from the Far West! Hello, there, Uncle; I am back again, but on real business this time. Say, all of you thoughtful cousins, I am nearly snowed under with all your cheer from all over the U. S. A. It was highly interesting and much appreciated by me. I didn't think that my first attempt would be published, but, to my surprise, I saw my own letter in the July number of COMFORT. Did I get cheered-up? Well, I guess YES. It came from a thousand cousins and is still a-cheering. I sure love to read the letters and I have managed to read them all, too. Our postmaster asked me what had happened, and I told him I was getting acquainted and visiting all my cousins through the mail. He said I received more mail than anyone in Grants Pass.

So, Uncle Lisha, could you help me out? I am trying to answer all that sent pictures, also those sending stamps, and as many of the others as I can now. I want to thank the cousins, one and all, for their letters, cards and pictures. I expect to be answering some for a year to come. I am going to be game anyway, so if some of you get an answer six months from now, don't be surprised—will you?

So many want to know about this part of the world, so here goes: Come on, Billy; I know you like cherries. We will drive up a mountainside for fifteen miles where, near the top, is a cherry orchard where I was two years ago. The trees are very high and some are three feet through. There are pink and white Royal Anns, Red Lamberts, Dark Red Oxhearts, Large Bings, and a coal black cherry that is very sweet. Most of these cherries are large as twenty-five cent pieces.

All aboard! Hi, oh! for the Oregon caves! Be sure and bring flashlights and wear your hiking clothes. All ready? Let's go! Here we string out, like a caravan, over a winding mountain road, through the woods and mountain tops for fifty-odd miles. We go over a new road just finished, and can drive nearly up to the mouth of the cave. It is like going into a mine. It has been an old water course, running underground, and has dried up. There are seven miles of walks through the explored part and many miles that have not yet been explored. The inside of the cave is a crystallized rock formation from the old water course, and it is transparent and very beautiful. When the light is thrown on it, it sparkles like fairyland. Guides are hired to take you through, as it is dangerous to try it alone and one can get easily lost.

Now for the place called the "Sticks"—which means forests, pines, firs and redwoods. There is a little town ninety-six miles from Grants Pass through the Sticks and mountain roads. At one place, at an elevation of 5,280 feet, the road goes over the top called Oregon Mountain. The end of the journey brings you to Crescent City, which dips its feet into the Pacific. On the way, as you drive through the redwoods, it is like going into a cellar. The tops can hardly be seen and the forest growth is so thick the sun never finds its way through. Crescent City is a small town; old and full of Indians, foreigners and white people. Lumbefing is the main industry. Large boats come from San Francisco and take away the lumber.

Then back to Grants Pass and we'll start for Crater Lake. This means a crooked, winding road for ninety-nine miles from Grants Pass to the Lake. The Lake has been said to be a volcano burned out. It is five miles across and the peaks around the edge are over a thousand feet high. In winter the snow gets so deep that only a few men come over on snowshoes and skis. July is the best month to visit the Lake by auto. You can travel all the way through to a large hotel and resort that has been built by the Lake. Here is where they have those beautiful sunsets. All of the cousins who, like me, are very romantic, will think it great.

And now to answer a few questions: Grants Pass is a sleepy little town. One long street, which is paved because the main highway goes right through. Not much work. There is a box factory, packing house and round house. Also a number of creameries. Mer-

Myra Armstrong settled back comfortably in the luxurious Pullman chair

Her Great Adventure

How a Woman's Spare Time Was Turned Into Ready Money

Story By Herberta Woodward
Illustration by Johanna Thorstrwon

Mrs. Paul Armstrong leaned back contentedly in the luxurious depths of her Pullman chair. The gentle swaying of the great coach soothed her into a dreaminess that found expression in languid eyes which idly drank in the beauties of the swiftly changing scenery. Mrs. Paul Armstrong was thinking.

This was the day of days to which she had so eagerly looked forward these past five years. Five years of wishing—and it seemed but yesterday that despair clutched heavily at her heart—her roseate dreams of the then future but mocking mirages of something that could never be.

Yet it had come to pass. Here she was on the journey she had been planning for so long. With keen satisfaction she contemplated the dress she wore. Never before had she been able to dress this way, and she sensed, womanlike, the attractiveness of her appearance.

And she had brought all these things into her life solely through her own efforts. Nobody had helped her. It was her victory and hers only.

She glanced at the tiny watch of white gold which gleamed on her wrist. Fifteen minutes more and she would greet the mother whom she had not seen for ten years. And she would be proud of how she looked. How happy she would be during the next four weeks of that long-delayed visit. To Myra Armstrong this was her great adventure and the climax was near.

Idly she began turning the pages of the magazine on her lap. Suddenly she stopped. There it was, the advertisement of the firm through which her fondest hopes had been realized. Her thoughts flew back over the months and in her mind's eye she saw plain as day another advertisement, the one she had answered when resolution had taken firm hold on her spirit and urged her to achieve the thing she wanted so much.

How well she remembered that first letter she had written to the Gearhart Knitting Machine Company. The promptness with which she had decided had astonished even herself and never a regret had there been during the months that followed. She was glad—glad, oh how glad she was that it had all come about.

If anyone had told Myra Armstrong five years back that she could go into business and actually earn money she would have looked at them in amazement. Married young, she had learned no trade or profession and had been taught to lean upon the male members of the family and look to them for everything. What they could not give her, she had learned to do without.

She had not been married long when misfortune entered her life. For some time her husband was out of employment. Business depression continued their extremity for a longer period.

Uncomplainingly she had accepted the inevitable, resolutely stilling every desire for pretty things, saving every penny, economizing until it seemed that they were living on air alone. It had been hard—very hard, for there was one desire that could not be quieted. It was to see her beloved mother who lived so far away.

Always is there something that impels towards success. It may be a great desire, a great ambition or a great love. In the end it wins if it is strong and great enough. It was love and desire that impelled Myra Armstrong to take up home knitting and relieve the financial stringency which threatened her health and happiness.

She had been attracted by more than one advertisement offering the means of home employment. One had not appealed to her as entirely reliable, another she put aside because there were veiled insinuations of unreasonable earnings, with homes, automobiles and grand pianos pictured as possibilities from the results of home knitting. She sensibly concluded that she could expect none of these and being sensible she wanted nothing more than a fair opportunity to turn her spare time to account for a fair remuneration. Finding the Gearhart Company a long established and conservative firm with a reputation for the squarest kind of dealing, the Gearhart Standard Knitter had been her choice.

Myra Armstrong remembered well the day the Knitter had arrived. She could hardly wait to unpack it and start knitting the Allwear Hosiery she had read about so much. It had not been easy at first. The precise, machine-like movements of the scores of needles were a little confusing but she was determined and, with the aid of the instruction book, soon mastered the operation. If thousands of other women could do it, she could and she did.

The start was slow, she remembered. The first pair of socks took some time but gradually her speed increased until one time she found she had earned nearly three dollars in a single day. And it was all done during spare time.

This hosiery she sent to Gearhart, who guarantees under a contract to accept and pay for all the Standard Allwear Hosiery a man or woman can turn out. Soon she found that she could sell the hosiery to stores and neighbors at good prices. Everybody admired the handsome, strong, well-knitted woolen socks. Now she was in business for herself—and indeed she had been right along, just as much as any manufacturer who makes a product for another to market. After a while her little business became established and although she had the contract to fall back on whenever she desired, yet neighbors and local stores took all she could turn out. Then came a day when the name of Myra Armstrong appeared on a little bank book; her savings grew; the lines of worry disappeared from her face and she sang as she worked.

The months passed quickly; for they were pleasant months to live. The simple things she needed came one by one, not costly things but good and serviceable. Then the long cherished journey to her mother.

"Bless that advertisement," cried Myra Armstrong almost audibly as the brakeman cried her stop. "I don't see why any woman need sigh and wish for the reasonable necessities of life when, with a little determination, a few dollars and the Gearhart Home Knitter, she can so easily find the key to her desires."

This illustrative story is frankly meant to impress the reader, man or woman, in a fair way, with the possibilities of utilizing spare time at home in the knitting of Allwear Hosiery.

The Gearharts want more home workers associated with them in the great Allwear Hosiery industry Everything is made as easy as possible. An iron-clad contract is given which obliges Gearhart to pay you a liberal price for knitting all the Standard, well-knitted hosiery you can turn out, free yarn is sent with each machine and all possible assistance rendered in getting started. Gearhart Knitting Machines do their work well and speedily when intelligently operated, they make less noise than a sewing machine and a mere child can turn the crank. They can knit many things besides Allwear Hosiery;—baby sweaters, caps, mufflers, scarfs, lovely things of wool for grownups and the children, mittens and other things.

Those who do not care to dispose of their product themselves will find the contract furnishes a ready market. If you wish to turn your spare time into profit, you will find Gearhart Home Knitting a pleasant and practical occupation. Morena's Cause for Thanksgiving

By Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"JENNIE Bliss stopped in this afternoon, Bob, to invite us to have Thanksgiving dinner with them tomorrow."

Morena Kenton looked just a little uncertainly at her husband, as she gave him the bit of news which she knew would surprise him.

He slowly turned from the sink at which he had been washing, and stood with towel suspended.

"Isn't it rather short notice?" he queried quietly.

"Yes, of course," Morena replied, "but Jennie is giving the dinner for Hattie and Fred Sharlow, and she didn't know they were coming to visit her until this morning. She's inviting the old crowd. The dinner will be at six in the evening, but we're to come at four. We'll play '500', Jennie said, before and after dinner. I—I—said we'd go," and Morena again looked at him a little uncertainly, for she felt that Bob would really have preferred not to go. In fact they seldom went with the coterie that had had such jolly times before they all had married.

But, as was always his custom ever since they were married, he always did what he thought would please her, for Bob Kenton had not the faculty of making money that some men had, and unconsciously he tried to make up this deficiency to Morena in other ways. Now he replied:

"If you want to go, Morena, why, of course, we shall. I don't suppose the children are invited?"

"No. Mattie and Fred are now so accustomed to doing things and having things done for them in city style, that Jennie didn't invite any of the crowd's children."

"What will the little shavers do for their Thanksgiving dinner?" Bob asked.

"Oh, we can have dinner at noon, the same as usual, and I'll prepare a lunch for them in the evening. Dolly can put Billie to bed, so that will be all right."

"I see you've made all the plans, Morena," he smiled, and then apparently trying to appear pleased over the prospect, he continued:

"It will be nice to have the old crowd together again, though I'm afraid we won't especially shine among them."

Anon, he seemed to fall into a reverie, and Morena quickly noted it, and she knew his thoughts were upon Fred Sharlow.

Fred had always been quick, brilliant and ambitious, and although a farmer boy, he had scorned the thought of pursuing the life-work of his forefathers. He wanted wealth and position and you couldn't get them farming. He was one of those nervous, excitable characters who seem never to rest until the grave closes over them.

Bob Kenton, on the other hand, had, after marrying Morena, purchased a small farm and as if to confirm Sharlow's belief, after ten years, was still trying to get rid of the debt upon it.

Sharlow's ambitions would have been a matter of no concern to Bob and Morena Kenton if it had not been for the fact that Fred had been deeply in love with Morena. Always well dressed, and keeping abreast of the times, he was a man most any girl might have been proud to marry—from outward appearances, at least. But Morena had consulted her heart, not head, in the choice of her mate, and had accepted the slow, plodding Bob, whom she loved, for there was that about him that drew her to him. Handsome, Bob undoubtedly was, thoughtful and tender, a man of splendid physique, whereas Fred Sharlow hid a deficient body in clothes especially calculated to make a man appear strong and manly.

Morena could have had Fred, for he had laid his heart at her feet, but when she refused him, he had, after a month or two of pique, bestowed his attentions upon Hattie Frazier and they were shortly married. Then Waterville became too small for him and he went to the city, and succeeded beyond his wildest dreams. Everything he touched seemed to turn to gold and his final triumph came in the last few years when he organized a radio company, the returns of which Waterville folk said, had made him a millionaire.

Nor was the town allowed to forget him, for knowing that his ambitions had been slightingly spoken of, he paraded his success under their very noses, so to speak, through Hattie's letters, for he had not showed his person in town for quite a number of years back.

Whenever some news of Fred's success came to the village, everyone seemed to take especial delight in bringing it to the attention of Morena, for somehow people felt that Morena would have better become the fortunes of Fred Sharlow than did Hattie Frazier who became given to condescending ways with them—and for this they blamed Morena.

Morena finished getting the supper ready and presently there was a crow from the bedroom where little Billie had been napping. She went to him and he yawned and stretched, and his bird-like chirping sent a warm rush of happiness through Morena's heart. She picked him up and brought him into the kitchen.

"I wish Dollie would come," she remarked, and as wishes sometimes are horses, Dollie presently did, full of stories of the preparations at the Bliss home as detailed at the store.

"All that fuss might have been over you, Morena," Bob said with a queer smile.

"Well, it isn't," Morena replied, just a little sharply.

The next morning Morena was up early, but there was a little heaviness about her heart. In her dreams she had seemed to be the wife of Fred Sharlow and found herself within a city mansion and gowned and jeweled like unto a millionaire's wife. To wake from such a dream to starting a daily routine of farm life on a lowering morning is——

However, she bustled about as she had done for the past ten years, and then when Bob went out to attend to some work that he had, she admonished Dollie to take care of Billie and to watch the turkey and then she started for town, to make a few purchases. She started afoot, for it was not a long walk as their farm was on the outskirts of the little town.

As she came to the corner of Main Street, a large limousine swung into it. It was a big, glistening thing, polished to a nicety, a machine that had undoubtedly cost at least ten thousand dollars. Within it sat a woman, swathed in furs, an expensive hat of extravagant design upon her head and glittering pendants at her ears. The man beside her was wrapped in even as expensive style.

Of course it was Fred and Hattie Sharlow and they recognized Morena for they gaily waved to her, though they gave no word to their liveried chauffeur to stop.

For a moment Morena gazed at the disappearing car, then suddenly her heart filled with bitterness. Was it worth while, after all, to marry for love? The humiliation of having been seen afoot, clad in old clothes (in her mind's eye Morena was making her appearance far worse than truth warranted) by the man who had loved her and by the woman whose place she might now be occupying had she decided differently, was hard to swallow.

By the time she reached the store, everyone about had seen the big limousine, and comment was agog.

Her purchases made, Morena returned to her home with rebellion at her heart, although, dutifully, she tried to be gay, especially when she viewed the bowed heads of the children as they bent in grace over their Thanksgiving dinner, and she felt how unworthy of the love of the little household she was.

After dinner she and Bob prepared for the visit, and then Morena wished she had refused the invitation because of their clothes. They were good garments and both she and Bob looked very well, Bob in particular because of his splendid physique, but, in imagination, Morena compared them with what she thought Hattie would wear, and the comparison was odious.

Then they sat around for a while, as it was too early to go, and altogether it was a most unsatisfactory Thanksgiving day. Dinner had been rushed to give them time for getting ready and now they could do little since the time was too short to do anything and yet long enough to pass exasperatingly slow.

Bob, however, seemed unaware of her discontent, for he tried to appear that the whole prospect was very pleasing.

Finally the time to go arrived and Bob went out to hitch up, and that accomplished, he drove up before the house. Then the children were kissed and admonished and they started off.

A nasty misty sleet filled the air and blew in their faces as old Fleetfoot jogged along. Morena could not help but contrast the disagreeable journey with what it would be if she were riding in Sharlow's sumptuous limousine. Bob did his best to make her comfortable, and his tender concern was annoying. If he would do something that she could, in a measure, scold and relieve her feelings of the tension upon them.

Bob kept up a cheerful conversation as they drove along.

"I suppose they will 'put on the dog'," he said smiling. "I'm afraid I'll be a sort of misfit. I somehow was never much for this sort of thing and after I got you, it seemed I wanted nothing else in the world. I wonder if my contentment isn't a sort of selfishness, after all."

That was just like him! No ambition at all. She did not realize then that the winning of her love had been his highest ambition and his utter content was her highest compliment.

"Of course, we'll be the first to be there!" Morena exclaimed, as they reached the house and saw no machines parked before it. "But perhaps it is just as well, as I suppose the rest of the bunch will all come in machines. Drive around and put Fleetfoot into the barn and don't say anything about how we came."

She spoke impatiently, and immediately was aware of a pained, bewildered look on Bob's part, as if he sensed that he had hurt her, but could not fathom how. But he said nothing, and drove away, while Morena went into the house, where she was admitted by Jennie, who, after greeting her, begged to be excused a moment.

Alone, Morena sat down in the parlor. Jennie had drawn all the shades, and the lights were lit, but shaded. A big fire burned in the grate, and the appropriate decorations gave a festive air to the room and made it the more comfortable in contrast to the blustering outdoors.

"Ah, what money cannot do!" Morena thought, as she sat, quiet as a mouse but with wrath at her fate. Why had she ever decided to come? Heretofore, she had always succeeded in crowding down any discontent that occasionally arose in her heart, but now, going among people who were wealthy, she wondered if, after all, she had not made a mistake. She had never positively disliked Fred Sharlow——

Suddenly her attention was arrested by sounds from above, apparently suppressed quarreling, then a door opened and the voices became more distinct.

"For the love of Pete; couldn't you get that dress a bit shorter and a little bit lower? You're a sight!"

"Oh, shut up! You're forever complaining and criticizing. I've worn this dress before and you said nothing about it. But it seems as if you've just got to pick on me. I know you're just sore that you lost that order, but why take it out on me?"

"Well, why don't you give me a little sympathy, then? If I were some plodding old mule with nothing to worry me, then perhaps there might not be any excuse for my exploding, as you so elegantly express it. I think that with all I do for you, you ought to be willing to put up occasionally with my crankiness——"

"Occasionally I would—if it were occasionally," Hattie returned sarcastically.

"Right well you're all sweetness and loveliness when I hand out two or three hundred dollars for a new dress."

"Do you want me to look like a—a—sewer-digger's wife?"

"Oh, cut it out!"

"All right. I'm going to stay up here and I won't go down, there!"

There was a pause, then Morena heard Hattie sniff. Then came whispering and finally she heard Sharlow say:

"Come, don't let's look as if we've been quarreling," and after a little more cooing, Morena heard them start down the staircase.

At this, she quietly rose from her chair and noiselessly hurried to the library beyond, and when the couple had come into the room, she advanced to meet them with outstretched hand.

There was in Fred's manner an old-time gallantry that somehow brought back the times before he had proposed and had been rejected. But she did not quite envy Mattie in her gorgeous gown.

The other guests began to arrive. All came more or less "dolled up" and in automobiles, even though some were the humble "tin lizzies."

Presently the entire company sat down to play "500" and the game progressed merrily, Morena's score was piling up when, in a thoughtless moment she committed that cardinal sin in cards, "trumping her partner's ace." Her partner happened to be her husband this time. As she began the usual protest, he smiled his sunny smile and said:

"It's all right, old girl. We're all apt to forget ourselves occasionally."

At length dinner was served. It was a sumptuous meal and heartily relished by the gathered company.

"It is usual to state what we're thankful for at a Thanksgiving dinner," Jim Bliss remarked. "Suppose we make the round of the table?"

With the result, of course, that every one was thankful for something especially foolish.

After the dinner, the company again sat down to cards, Morena's luck being nothing short of miraculous. Fred Sharlow's was just the opposite, and when he came to be partner with his wife, he growled:

"I don't care about winning a prize, but pshaw, it does get one's goat when you play and can't do a thing."

"Well, here's a nice hand, Mr. Sharlow," Morena said, dealing him the cards.

"So it is," he returned, as he picked up the first and then the balance of the cards. "Not bad. I guess I can make six in hearts."

Joe Turner who was Morena's partner passed, then Hattie raised her husband's bid to eight. Then Morena passed and the bid was Hattie's.

But when luck is against you, you might just as well give up. Fred's playing brought out Hattie's trumps, the cards she had hoped to make the two points she had raised the bid. Fred's scowling got her the more rattled, and she made the "bonehead" play, trumping her partner's ace.

That "set" them.

Fred went completely off the handle.

"My gawd!" he exclaimed. "Where did you ever learn to play cards? If I couldn't use my few brains I possess, I'd quit."

"Oh, you're such a star," retorted Hattie grievedly.

"Well, anybody ought to know not to trump her partner's ace. Why didn't you hold the trump in reserve? Now we're another 300 in the hole."

"Well, if you can't hold your temper, why do you play cards then? I wish you were never my partner. No one else bawls me out the way you do for a poor play, and I'm going to quit right now. Jennie, you take my place, will you?"

"There, there, Hattie," Jennie said soothingly (she wasn't playing), "don't mind. I suppose it was awfully exasperating when Fred's luck has been so poor during the evening and then when he gets a chance to make his bid, to lose it by careless play. Why, the fate of nations doesn't rest upon the game. Come, continue."

Hattie allowed herself to be persuaded, but a cloud had settled down upon the company and as the hour was growing late, Jennie, for her guests' comfort, ended the game, and awarded the prize to Morena, a beautiful cut-glass salad bowl.

After some general conversation, the crowd broke up, and all hurried to leave, as the announcement came that a driving snowstorm had set in.

"How are you going home, Morena?" Mr. Turner queried. "Shall we give you a lift?"

"No, thank you," Morena's voice rose happily above the babble. "I'm just a farmer's wife, and we go about in the good old-fashioned way in a 'one-boss shay.' Bob is getting ready."

She bade them all good night then, and while the machines snorted and buzzed and threw out clouds of gasolene exhaust, old Fleetfoot plodded in among them to the curb, and Morena, assisted by Bob, got in and, after he had carefully placed the blankets about her, got in and off they drove.

"We really must get a 'tin lizzie'," Bob said just a little shamefacedly, "it seems too bad that only you, of the old set, haven't a car of some kind."

"Oh, I don't mind, Bob; and look what a time some of them had getting started. Old Fleetfoot is at least dependable. And then we can snuggle together so much better when we put the responsibility of bringing us home upon Fleetfoot," and she put her arms about him.

Thus they rode until they reached home. Morena waited for Bob to put Fleetfoot in the barn and walked with him to the house. As the ground slushed under their feet, Bob raised Morena in his arms and carried her to the door.

"You're a thoughtful old dear, Bob," she said.

"I'm a plodding old boob, rather," Bob said, "but if you're satisfied with me, I don't care what anyone else thinks. Wasn't that a stunning car Sharlow had? And that was some gown Hattie wore. I guess it is pretty nearly the truth that he's a millionaire."

They were in the house by this time, and Bob was poking up the fire.

"All that might have been yours, Morena," he finished, half in jest, half in earnest.

"Yes, but look at the man that goes with it. I thought when I saw that car this morning that I envied Hattie, but when I heard them quarreling—and there was that in their tones that led me to believe that it was a common occurrence and generally Fred's fault—I felt mighty thankful, I can tell you, that I let my heart judge in the matter of marriage. If I had told the truth at the table tonight, I should have said that I was supremely thankful for the fact that I had not married Fred Sharlow. Poor Fred! Poor Hattie! They may have wanted to impress us, but I've seen through the veil."

And then she went on to tell Bob of what conversation she had overheard early in the evening and of course did not need to refer to the open squabble which Fred and Mattie had indulged.

"Poor Fred!" Morena repeated. "He doesn't know that he was my greatest cause for thanksgiving!"

Comfort's League of Cousins

chants mostly care for their own stores with the aid of their families. In the fall there is hop picking, and fruit gathering and packing. As yet this is not much of a farming country. Not much of the land has been cleared for farming yet, although a lot of it has been logged. It rains for about five months during the winter and not at all in the summer. The warmest it has been here was 109 in the shade. If any of you head this way, don't forget the dough if you want to see the scenery, for they sure have it here.

All you dear cousins who asked about bobbed hair and rats: well, give me the bobbed hair every time, but if you have a lot of golden or raven or Titian tresses, for goodness sakes don't cut them off. As for powder puffs, well, a little in reason in fine, so long as you don't kalsomine your face and put war paint on your lips and eyebrows. All of we Western fellows object to paint kisses. We like 'em natural, girls.

I have one brother the same shade as myself and a dear mother and daddie. My father is an American and my mother part German and Spanish. I guess we are a Duke's Mixture!

Who is the little cousin of Oklahoma who wrote to me but did not send her name or address? I would like to hear from her. And another little Kansas cousin who has "light brown hair and dark blue eyes—so dark many people think they are brown." I would like to hear from her, please? And a third who sent me postcards—five of 'em—each signed A. C. McB.

I am making a cousins' album, and I would be delighted to have pictures of all the cousins who will send them. Will try and return some of mine.

Thanking you, Uncle Lisha, in advance, for printing this so I can answer the loads of letters. And if you ever come this way I will show you all the scenery and you can get all the venison you want—and Billy can have the cherries.

Good by, Uncle Lisha, Billy and all the cousins. I will drop in again some time if you want me to. Don't all answer at once!

Your loving nephew, LEON GARNER.

Well, Leon, you do seem a lot more cheerful than when you wrote us last July—which proves what a joy-producing crowd our Big Family is when the Happy Bunch gets on the job of cheering up any lonesome member I remember I warned you that you would have to stay home for a while and answer letters. I see now, by your own reckoning that you will be pen- and ink-fast in Grants Pass for a year at least! Anyway, this long newsy letters of yours will keep all curious correspondents contented until you can get caught up with the cheer crowd.

Leon, if ever I come to the coast I'll get to the Main street of Grants Pass sure and shake hands with you right under the big electric sign. Then you and I will go deer hunting—while Billy takes a little sight-seeing tour of his own through those caves—without a guide, of course!

BEWELCOME, MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR MR. LISHA:

Oh, how I wish I could claim you as my real uncle! For you are such a dear man you have half the world in love with you. I know you are so kind hearted you just simply can't refuse to publish my little "ole" letter. For I have just finished reading the August letters and they were so interesting I just had to come in and chat a while. I love to read where the folks tell of their homes and country. I live in southern Mississippi where the corn and cotton grow and where we have good schools. The horned owls are our bestest wild friends. They sit in the woods and talk to us all the day long, so as to let us know they haven't forgotten us.

I am a girlie of sixteen summers. I have dark hair and brown eyes that speak for themselves. I finished the tenth grade this past winter at our new consolidated school that sits on the hill. Let me say right here that we are all proud of our new school building. We have five teachers. Uncle, or Mr. Lisha, won't you come and go to school with us? You know so much about geography, history and English you would be a great help to us folks. And, Mr. Lisha, I know you would fall in love with our country and people. I don't say we haven't some bad people, but you find these everywhere, don't you, Uncle?

How I wish Wilmer D. Sweet had asked us to write to him! I think he could come again and tell us more about his home country.

Uncle, as I have a long way to walk home, I will ask you and Wilmer to walk part of the way with me.

All of you cousins who care to write, I will be glad to hear from you.

Your new friend, JUANITA SHORT.

Juanita, you seem to want to be so formal, I ought to call you Miss Short, perhaps. But let me tell you, no matter what title you give me, I'm the realest possible Uncle—so you must not put any handle to my name, not if you want me ever to come down to Bewelcome in southern Mississippi and go to school with you and the horned owls. I'm pretty sure you're right about my falling in love with your country and people, Juanita; I think it's certain I'd love one of the people, anyway! As for the bad ones, I imagine you are safe in saying these can be found everywhere, but the best rule is not to look for them very close. Some nosey, nasty folks are watching out for bad people all the time, and it is surprising, when you listen to their stories, how many they have discovered. But it is the poorest sort of discovering and they might spend their time in much better ways.

Juanita, you tell us of the owls that talk "all the day long"; how about these conversational eyes of yours which you say speak for themselves"? I hope they do not start in sending brown whispers to some Mississippian whose legs are so long they reach under three school desks ahead. Talking eyes are dangerous, Nita, and you must watch out they never say anything you don't mean. For a good talkative pair of eyes can say a lot more, at times, than any competing red lips. I have known cases where fellows have made big mistakes about what they thought some lively long-lashed optics had said. But I'm sure your eyes are good honest ones, Juanita, and that they will say only the sweetest and truest things to Cousin Wilmer and me as we walk home with you as far as where the horned owls say "Howdy" and welcome you back.

TEXICO, NEW MEXICO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I am asking for some information about a bachelor life. I have been lying awake nights wondering and worrying about future wives, and I haven't even a girl. Is there any kind of tonic that could be taken to prevent this? Hoping that you will answer this soon, I am,

Your old pal SHINERY BOVE.

Shinery, I'm not quite sure which of your bachelor worries and wonderings may be your real troubles: whether it is the uncertainty of the number, color and ages of your "future wives" that is the seat of your complaint, or just the sad and lonely fact that you have not yet begun on number one of the plural affinities you seem to be planning to make into Mrs. Boves. Anyway, as a bachelor myself, Shinery, old pal, the manner in which you calmly sling around that fearful phrase, "future wives," startles me considerable. I have never reckoned quite so liberally. One wife ought to be wonder and worry—or joy and delight enough for any bachelor, even in such a spacious state as New Mexico. I can't properly diagnose your case with the few symptoms you give, Shinery. It may be matrimonialbus pluralis or even something more serious—or fatal. I hesitate to prescribe, particularly as I am not sure if you want a tonic to prevent the future wives, or an elixir that will bring to you the first of your coming helpmates. I'd like to advise you about this, old pal, but you leave me too much in doubt. All I know is that Solomon had even more wives than you can possibly be wondering and worrying about, and the poor guy kept right on wondering and worrying just as much as when he was as single as you—or your Uncle. This can serve as either encouragement or discouragement, just as you prefer, Shinery; but I'm sure that Solomon or any other married man can bear witness to the historic fact that a wife is no sleeping powder. Single, double—or quadrupled—Shinery, I fear you will have to keep on wondering and worrying and lying awake once in a while. Neither single lives nor many wives can give immunity from these things.

ST. PETERSBURG, 801 TANGERINE AVE., EAST, FLORIDA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Hello! May I come in for a few minutes' chat with you? I will not stay long, for I know you are very busy.

First, as your seeing may not be very good, I will describe myself: I am five feet, two inches tall; have light brown hair—which is bobbed, deep blue eyes and light complexion. I guess I must be a blonde. I use a powder puff and am fourteen years of age. Also I am in the eighth grade.

I am not a Southern girl as you may suspect. I came South February 18th, the day before my birthday. I am from Ohio, the grand old state; so you see I am a Buckeye and am proud of it.

Say, Uncle Lisha, have you ar Billy ever been in St. Petersburg? If not, I will describe our city: We have lots of tourists here in the winter. St. Petersburg is a city of about 20,000 in the summer and 65,000 in the winter. It is right on Tampa Bay, six miles from the Gulf of Mexico. The water in Tampa Bay is very salty, especially when you are in bathing and somebody slips up behind you and ducks you unexpectedly. When the water in the Bay is calm, you can see out for miles and miles, where the heavens and earth meet.

Say, Uncle, do you like fish? I do. Not very long ago my papa, brother and I went fishing down on the Fountain of Youth pier. It was in the evening and we stayed till ten o'clock and caught a big mess of fish. But another man down there had better luck than we did. He used a half-inch rope, a fishhook about a foot long, and his bait was a large catfish. In about ten minutes after dropping the line he caught—what do you think?—a fish that weighed 335 pounds. This was in water eighteen feet deep, where the swimmers dive. But the King or Porpoise fish will not hurt you. It took six men to hold it and all six men to tow it to shore. There they tied the rope to a Ford and pulled it out of the Bay. Some fish, and a good catch, too.

There are several Indian graveyards here. The Indians bury their dead in a very peculiar way, I think. They gather shells and pile these in a mound about 200 feet around and thirty-five or forty feet high. In these they bury their dead.

In winter there are seaplanes buzzing around most of the time. I want to go up in one of these very bad and go above the clouds.

We raise many kinds of fruit here. As Billy or you may never have seen bananas in bloom, I am sending you some. We have many beautiful kinds of flowers, as this is the Land of Sunshine and Flowers. St. Petersburg is called the Sunshine City. Roses bloom all the year round as does the hibiscus also. Lilies are just coming out.

My letter is getting very long and I am tired of writing. I will ask one favor of the cousins and will return it in any way possible. I would like to hear of games that can be played at parties, such as birthday parties, masquerades, etc.

Those writing me I will try and answer as much as I can.

I wonder how many of the cousins are musical? I play the cornet, sing, and give comic recitations.

I sign myself,

Your Dixie friend,
LAVAUGHN M. FISHBURNE.

Yes, I like fish, LaVaughn, but not such big ones that you have to remove them from the briny by means of a Ford and a half-inch rope: If a Ford can do as well as this, it makes me wonder how much of a finny monster a Packard might capture from the crowded waters of Tampa Bay. Surely a 335-pound fish is large enough, however, for any appetite, and ought to hang around an icebox for several Fridays and then leave enough to make a substantial fish chowder. You say these heavyweight fish will not hurt one, LaVaughn; but what if I should be diving from the Fountain of Youth pier and should bump my Roman nose or intellectual brow against the backbone or left fin of such a scaly elephant? You'll have to have the ocean about that pier put through a strainer before I execute any backflips or swan dives among the porpoises.

LaVaughn, the only bananas I have ever seen in bloom are those whose golden blossoms glisten at a nickel each on the stand of the corner grocery where Bill buys his cocoa and shredded wheat. So you may be sure I appreciated the specimen you sent—which was thin-skinned and of delicious flavor. Billy placed it in his herbarium, next to a treasured specimen of a bud of the wild subway bush. Bill was interested to hear about the hibiscus flower and said he thought it must belong to the uneeda family. Botany is quite a fad with Bill, and he knows a lot about it—or says he does.

I'll bet you will never want to be back among the buckeyes again, LaVaughn, now that you can sit around under the shade of the tangerines and listen to the seaplanes and mosquitoes buzzing among the white crumbs of the nourishing hibiscus flowers.

DENVER, 115 SHERMAN ST., COLO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

When Billy the Goat reads the first part of this letter, I am sure he will be so glad when he learns that I like goats so well that he will gladly allow this letter to pass from your hands to the hands of the printer; in fact, I like goats so well that I am now taking goat milk for my health, because the highest medical authorities claim that goat milk is superior to the cow's milk, for it contains ten times as much iron as the milk from the cow. As it produces more fat, I am giving it a trial, for fat is certainly what I need.

As I have spoken so well of goats (which includes Billy, of course), I will now give you a compliment on the exceedingly well-written editorial which you wrote for the August issue of COMFORT; and, in which editorial, you have pointed out, so clearly, the fundamental causes of these deplorable conditions existing today.

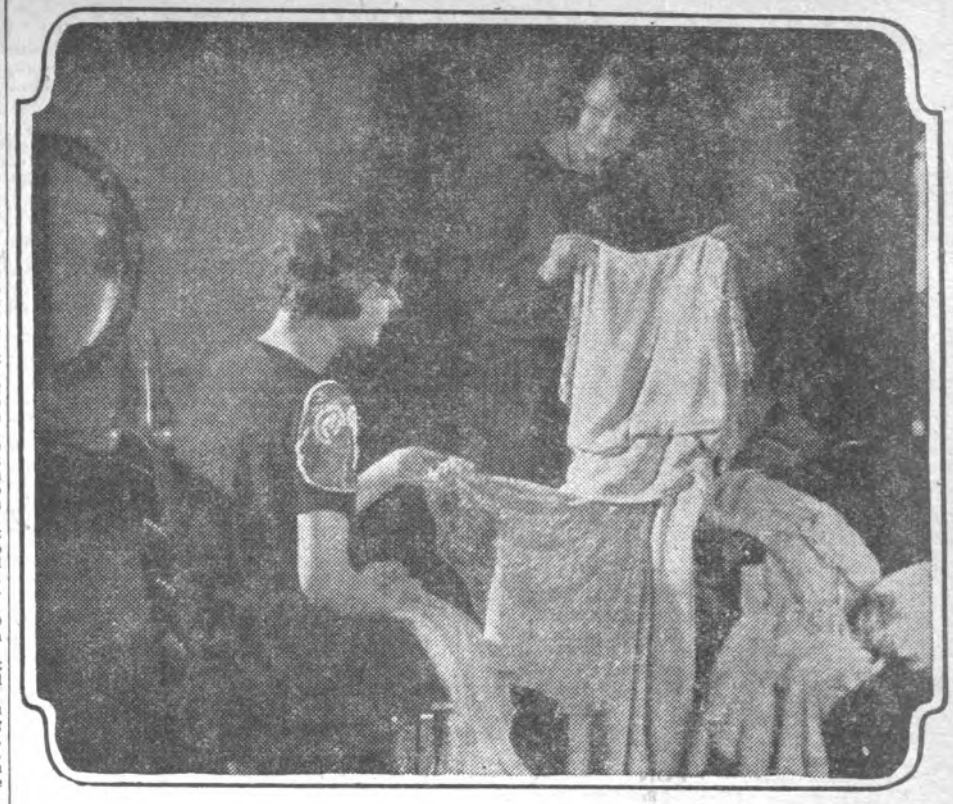
You are right when you say, "I would rather have the love, the trust and sympathy of the little children in the streets of this quiet, mountain-guarded town than all the science that can be packed in the dusty libraries of our loveless, doubting and tortuous-minded men."

Jesus Christ said: "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the Kingdom of God." (St. Luke 18: 16.)

But so many people are too selfish. They care nothing about the welfare of others. They think they haven't time to bother with little children. Yet some of these society women find time to bother with their poodle dogs, while there are thousands of poor, homeless orphans longing for the love and companionship of even a foster mother or father.

Some time ago, I was in the largest drug store of Denver, eating a dish of ice cream, and I overheard a conversation between the soda fountain clerk and a young girl who was sitting at the same table with me.

Evidently she had lost her dog, for the young man clerk asked her whether she had got a new dog yet or not. She replied: "No, I haven't. I was out to the dog fancier's and he wants more money for his dogs than a poor working girl like me can afford to pay. He wants $65 for a female dog and $125 for a male, but when I do get a dog, I want the best." Then the clerk replied: "I think I know where you can get a pretty good female dog for about $35 or $40."



It is just that class of people who are preventing poor people from realizing more of the comforts of life. The very idea of a working girl even thinking of paying $125 for a dog—even if she had the money. I have never yet seen a dog worth that much money. And here is another example of selfishness: shortly before last Christmas, a friend of mine saw a woman (in one of our large department stores) who paid $90 for a doll and $45 for a doll buggy, a Christmas present for her little girl. Of course, the doll had human hair, it could open and shut its eyes, and by pressing on a button could be made to even talk—saying such words as "Mamma," "Papa," "Hello" and "Good by," but even so, what doll is worth $90? And what usually becomes of a child reared in such luxury and extravagance?

While this foolish woman was paying $90 for a doll, no doubt there was some poor little girl standing in front of the show windows of that very same store, looking at some cheap doll—longing for it, even though it cost only 15 or 25 cents! And that poor child couldn't have it for the simple reason that she knew mamma couldn't get it for her because they needed that 15 or 25 cents to buy food to put into their mouths.

Even if I were a millionaire or was exceedingly wealthy, what real pleasure would I derive from buying a $90 doll for my little girl (if I had one) when, at the same time I knew there were thousands of poor little children suffering for the bare necessaries of life? No, indeed, there would not be any pleasure in doing such a foolish thing; but there would be real pleasure in making many poor children happy upon that glorious day of days—Christmas!

What is true happiness? Does it consist in buying $125 poodle dogs, $90 dolls or $10,000 automobiles? No; true happiness—the only happiness worthwhile—comes to those who make others happy. Suppose we could all afford a brand new $10,000 automobile. Would we be any happier than we are today? No; human

"George couldn't believe I had made them all myself!"

"HE WAS dumbfounded! And no wonder! Six months ago I couldn't sew a stitch! But when I told him the whole story, he said something that made me the happiest woman in town! I used to wonder where in the world my clothes money was coming from! But now—thanks to the School of Modern Dress—I have more and prettier clothes than I ever had before in my life—at a mere fraction of what they cost in the shops! And I know that what I did, other women or girls can do!"

Women everywhere are saying things like this, since they have learned, right in their own homes, in spare time, through the School of Modern Dress, how to makes all kinds of stylish, becoming clothes.

No longer do they have to say, "Oh! I'd just love to go, but I haven't a thing to wear." Now, at the mere cost of the materials, they can create for themselves dresses, suits, and hats that are appropriate and in good taste, whatever the occasion.

The remarkable "New Way Course in Fashionable Clothes-Making" was prepared under the guidance of expert dressmakers in simple, step-by-step lessons. You need not know anything at all about sewing to begin with. The lessons start with the very simplest stitches and teach to you step-by-step all the correct "professional" methods of the dressmaker's art, until you can plan and completely make even the most elaborate clothes for yourself or others.

The directions are so simple that anyone who can read can readily understand them—and the pictures show, by actual photographs, just exactly what to do.

The New Way Course is designed to accomplish in a few months what formerly would have taken two or three years to do. With it, hundreds of women have solved their clothes problems; with it, you can solve yours too.

Suppose a fashionable new gown attracts you in a shop window. You see that it is just the style most becoming to you, just the kind of a new frock you want. Through the New Way Methods of sewing, you can duplicate this dress in a few evenings—at one third or less the ready-made cost. And for the saving you effect, you can have two more pretty dresses.

Or suppose that the gown you see in the window is not quite appropriate to your type of figure. You can duplicate the style, change the color to suit yourself, alter the lines a trifle here or add a touch there—and you have a distinctive gown, made just for you.

For the New Way Course teaches you more than how to make beautiful clothes. It shows the way to make clothes that are beautiful on YOU. You will learn how to combine your dress materials into an artistic interpretation of yourself. Home-Made Christmas Gifts

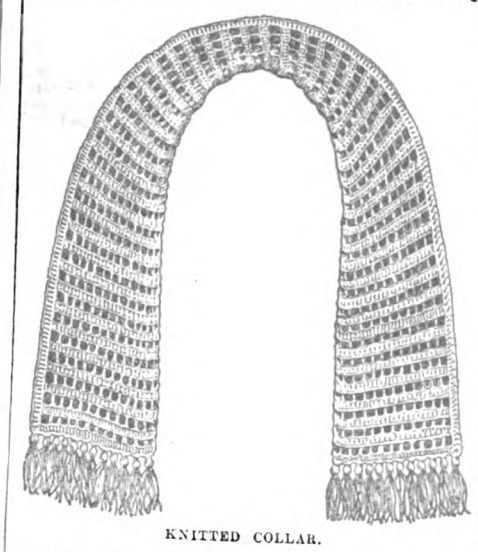
By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT is the homeworker whose holiday gifts show thought and individuality, and care for the needs of the recipient, that extends the most pleasure, rather than the one who plans on a basis of mere dollars and cents.

No doubt many of you are already fashioning your gifts from the pages of COMFORT which are devoted to our homeworkers, and I am hoping that you may also find something in the present suggestions that may prove of timely assistance in your Christmas preparations.



It would seem as if no season had ever offered so many things that can be added to the list of suitable gifts. Something to wear always pleases young people, and in this particular realm are the pretty woolen scarfs, either knitted or made from soft woven materials. Jersey cloth is one of the best materials. Unless it can be obtained tube-woven, use a yard and a half length and sew the two selvages together. Gather the edges of the ends, draw tightly and sew. Crochet two filet caps about two inches deep from bright wool and sew over the ends, and finish each with a long tassel to match. Another scarf that is extremely becoming is made from soft Scotch suiting and is fringed to match one of the colors. This scarf is made single, and as these materials are double-faced no lining is required.

Girdles that may be worn with a variety of dresses are among the Christmas novelties, and the braided ones seem to outdo the others in popularity. To make one, cut three strips of material two inches wide, sew edges together and turn. The three strands may be alike, or each of a different color. Braid very flat and evenly. Make a single tie at the ends of braiding and blindly tack. The strands are cut long enough for ends which fall at the side.

For the traveler there are the hat bags, slipper and rubber bags, and hand bag in which to tuck the magazines and sweaters, all made from black sateen. All of these bags are of the simplest type, drawn up with ribbon or cord. Applique flowers in colored chambray provide the decorations.

Knitted Woolen Collars

COLLARS CROCHETED FROM COLORED WOOLS are among the Christmas gifts this season. Any open stitch may be used, so long as the edge is kept straight and even. Knitted from light-weight wool, with alternate rows of the hemstitch, the collars are most attractive. One-half of the collar is made and the front end finished. The second half is made by commencing at the center back and working to the end. In this way both ends will look alike. Finish with wool fringe looped through every third opening.

Ostrich Feather Trimmed Bag

This is a feather season, even to using odd bits with which to trim bags. Take any old ostrich feathers, white, black or colored. Wash by drawing them back and forth through tepid suds made of good white soap. Use tepid clear water to rinse. Hang to dry in the sun. The feathers are nearly straight when used for this purpose, but if too straight, draw each flue over the back of a knife. To use, cut off in small bunches and sew them to a fold of the bag material, or they may be sewed onto the bag, and the ends concealed by a fold blinded over them. If onto the fold, sew over the ends a narrow ribbon, making a square knot at frequent intervals. For dancing or party bags, the feathers are bordered with a band of tiny flowers. The draw strings are of ribbin, the ends being tied together and finished with a tassel made from the ostrich feather flues. The bag material is of satin or fine velvetine, and often matches a particular gown or cape.

Decorated Tin Trays

TIN TRAYS that are found at the general, or at the five-and-ten stores, may be so decorated as to make attractive and useful gifts. Sometimes these trays are painted black, giving a ready foundation for the design. The magazines provide so many artistic patterns that a design for the tray will be easily obtained. To transfer this, rub tailor's chalk onto the back of the design, then place the chalked side on the tray, very lightly holding it with the finger-tips of the left hand. With a well-pointed pencil trace out the design, and when the paper is lifted an outline by which to paint will be seen. Artist's oil colors put up in collapsible tubes are best and most convenient for this kind of decoration. Bronzes do not wear as well. Common paints will surprise the user in attractive effects and durability, especially for the solid color backgrounds. If the trays are painted in a solid color, and the design in a variety of colors, use touches of black to bring out the pattern. Small sable or camel's-hair brushes are required for the fine work.

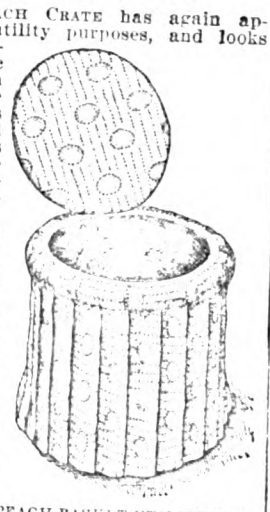
One particularly pretty band design was developed by coloring white household enamel with tube colors. A very narrow outer edge was in black, then followed a wide band of soft yellow, then graduated bands in gray, pink and pale green. In the center was a silhouette of a child's head in black against a gray background.

Hand-Painted Oilcloth Doilies

PEBBLED OILCLOTH DOILIES are more and more used as their real value is appreciated. The ones illustrated are designed for a long table, the centerpiece being cut long enough to extend from edge to edge, thereby answering the purpose of two extra doilies. The young girls who are able to draw, and most girls are, find this decorating of oilcloth a very pleasing as well as useful accomplishment. The artist's tube oil colors are the most convenient for this work, and it goes so far that the cost is reduced to a trifle if one is doing many pieces. The oilcloth costs about 30 cents a yard.



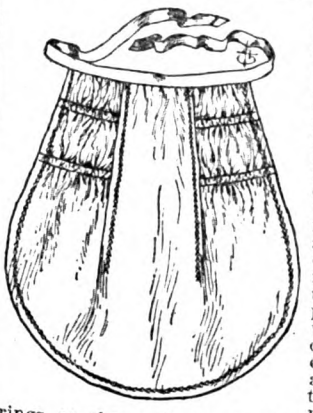
PEBBLED OILCLOTH TABLE SET.

One does not need to restrict herself to making doilies, for whole covers that do not quite reach to the edge of table may have a "stunning" border painted on. Covers for dressers, commodes, side-tables, plant tables, etc., are other uses to which painted oilcloth may be put.

It is well always to make a solid band of black or color around the edges. Ideas from wallpaper, from flowered materials or those in conventional designs, or from magazines, will provide the worker with an unlimited source from which to work out her designs.

Peach Basket Utility Box

THE COVERED PEACH CRATE has again appeared for general utility purposes, and looks very much like a neatly-plaited skirt. There are other shapes in fruit and vegetable baskets and crates that may be covered in the same way, thus making an attractive as well as a useful article for the living-room.



PEACH BASKET UTILITY BOX.

The crate is first brushed clean, then covered smoothly inside with cotton cloth. Old cloth that is still strong can be used for this purpose, sewing it on firmly as a foundation for the outside covering. The cloth is cut long enough to go three times around the top edge of crate and deep enough to extend nearly to the floor with the addition of an inch hem. Pin the top edge into side plaits that meet, and then slip it over the crate to see if it fits. When this is done, baste the plaits full length and give a hard pressing. Sew the two ends together and press flat. Sew the cover into the lining at the top edge of the crate, then neatly tack around a band of the material. If there is no crate cover, make one of thin wood or heavy cardboard; cover first with a little padding, then with the lining material before the outside covering is put on.

Another way of covering these crates is to use a gathered valance around the crate and a shallow ruffle around the top edge. Calico, gingham, cretonne or chintz make excellent covers, as they can be removed and washed.

A Dress-Up Apron

There are many times when the need of an apron is felt, yet we do not exactly want to put on a work apron. The one here pictured is ideal for a lunch social, a visiting apron, or for a company afternoon at home. The one pictured is made of soft fine muslin. In cutting, round the bottom and make the sides straight. Hem one-third of an inch deep. Lay two shallow plaits at the center in opposite directions about eight inches apart. Between the plaits and hem make double shirrings as shown in illustration. Draw the shirrings evenly, also gathering threads at the top which draw each way from the center, until the apron is of the fullness to fit. Fasten the threads, and at the back of shirrings carry a strip of muslin wide enough to cover, with edges turned in. Cross-stitch or outline around the hem, fasten the plaits with the same stitch, and also the shirrings.

Suit Hanger

One always welcomes something new in a hanger as they are the means whereby we can keep our coats in shape and free from wrinkles, and our skirts hanging straight. A covered hanger is always preferable, as metal will rust, and leaves spots. The one illustrated is made of wood just thick enough to take in the screw end of a large hook. Cut two pieces of old velvet the exact size of hanger with added seam allowance, slip over the wood, turn in the straight edges and sew together. Two large cup hooks are then put in, upon which hangs the skirt. If the hanger is to be used for a man's suit, omit the hooks, run through strong loops of tape sewed to each end, pass a small wooden or covered brass rod through which to hang the trousers. In doing this, fold the bottoms evenly together with seams and creases matching, and hang evenly. In a degree this prevents "bagging" if regularly attended to. The vest hangs under the coat. The hanger is now complete so far as usefulness goes, but if to be made for a gift, add a little embroidery and a loop of ribbon.

Utility Box

Baskets are not always readily found by those who live far from the larger shops, so that way of making something at home to take their place is often welcomed. If you have a round wooden tin or pasteboard box you can use it. If not, cut a circle of wood one-half inch smaller in diameter than a flat tin stewpan cover of the desired size, which will make the foundation for the box cover. Use heavy cardboard for the sides of box, turning the lower edge to the wooden bottom, bringing it well over and lapping and sewing the ends together. Use ribbon or silk to cover the box, and wide enough to turn over the top edge and onto the wooden bottom. Before joining the ends, mark a diamond-shaped design around the box, outline with heavy floss and fasten a tiny bead of seed beads or one long bead at each corner. Join ends, gather the lower edge and slip the band over the box. Draw the gathers until it brings the edge well under the box and fasten. Turn the top edge onto the inside and fasten with a very little glue. Cut a piece of old velvet or felt the size of bottom and fasten it on with glue. To line, cut a strip one-fourth longer than the outside band, and a circle for the bottom with added seam allowance. Gather the top edge and from the wrong side tack it blindly to the turned in edge of outside band. Seam ends on wrong side. Turn under lower edge, gather finely and sew over-and-over to the turned-under edge of bottom. For the cover, cut a round of silk and lining of same material as box is covered with, turn under the edge and baste. Use same material for top, cutting a strip long enough to allow for slight fullness and wide enough to reach from edge to center. Seam ends together. Sew the two parts together, turn and slip over the top cover. Gather, draw up at the center, and fasten. Wind the wire ring with a folded crossways piece of the silk. Finish the edge with a narrow piece of lace with open design.

UTILITY BOX.

Home-Made Desk Pad

It would seem as if most anything could be made into "a thing of beauty" if our old beaver tops can go into the making of a handsome desk pad. But they must be properly prepared and kid is preferable. Cut the pieces as large as possible, wet, and tack them smoothly on a piece of board to dry. Cut into three-cornered pieces as shown in illustration. Turn a half-inch hem across the longest edge and hold it in place with liquid glue. If the leather seems soft, glue on a thin muslin lining. Cut a piece of stiff cardboard any desired size. Unless it is clean and smooth, cover both sides with a good quality of smooth, brown wrapping paper, fitting it on. Cover edges with black passe-partout binding. Lay the four leather corners in place, turn edges over cardboard and glue down. Polish with liquid glue blacking. Cut large-sized blotters to fit the pad and slip the corners under the leathers. In case large blotters are unobtainable, keep the pad fresh with any kind of smooth, heavy paper.

Sunbonnet Needlecase

Almost as frivolous in appearance as a chorus girl's sunbonnet, but vastly more practical, is the little sunbonnet needlecase shown in illustration. The sides, of silk-covered pasteboard, sewed together in pin-ball fashion, measure two by three and one quarter inches on top and back, curving on outer edge. Four little leaves of flannel take care of the needles while the thread and thimble are concealed in the hood part, made by gathering and sewing a piece of five and one-quarter by seven and one-half inch ribbon onto pasteboard sides. Knots of ribbon tie the tops together.

she had expected Lesard to be among them she was mistaken. He was not there.

Very weary and out of heart the girl evaded the French maid's cordial invitation to supper, and went back to her room. She longed for fresh air, for the house was stifling, and opening Gillian's window, she leaned out. What she saw surprised her. She was certainly in the second story, but the house was built on rising ground, and at the back, where she was, the windows opened on a wide terrace only raised a few feet from the ground.

"A fine place for burglars!" she remembered Gillian's terrors fearlessly. "I shall lock the windows every night," but she made no move to do it now, only stared aimlessly into the thick shrubbery that covered the hill behind the house, a forlorn, dreary figure in the sumptuous bedroom.

She was tired. Her tight satin dress was uncomfortable; she longed to take it off and put on a dressing-gown; but for a maid to await her mistress in such a toilet would never do.

"Keep up your courage, Jacky," she said to herself grimly, and sat determinedly reading till Gillian appeared.

"I thought I should never get here," the girl said, shutting the door and tearing off her pearls, as though they choked her. "Why did you wait for me? But I'm glad you did. I wouldn't have liked to wake you."

She was speaking very fast and hoarsely, as though her throat were dry. She dragged off her dress and threw it on the floor as if the touch of it were hateful.

"It's not late, and—oh, Gill! you'll tear it. Let me help you."

"Don't touch it!" said Gillian, her eyes glittering. "You don't know how it was come by, how any of my fine clothes were got."

"What do you mean? What's the matter?"

But the answer was another question.

"Jacky, what did you say Gibbs' purple velvet was trimmed with?"

"Imitation amethysts and pearls."

Gillian sat down by the fire.

"Are you sure they weren't real?" she said, very quietly.

"Oh, they couldn't be."

Gillian laughed.

"Lady Hollis was there tonight," she said, with seeming indifference. "A tall, slightish woman, with big bones. It was her first appearance since the burglary. Before dinner everyone was congratulating her on having lost so little; and she said she had lost one very curious thing, a velvet dress trimmed with seed pearls and amethysts. It was new, and she had been looking at it; she just laid it over a chair when she went to bed. And the jewels on it were worth a great deal."

"Well—but——" Jacky had forgotten her weariness.

"She never saw it again. The burglar she didn't struggle with must have taken it, for there were two. Don't you see, Jacky?"

"The dyed velvet—that didn't fit!" said Jacky slowly. "Oh, it couldn't be! It never could be."

"It is. I know it. That is what is wrong with Mr Marchmont, Jacky. That was why he adopted me. To get into all these grand houses, and then let in his friends to rob. Don't you see I opened every door to him? And they didn't know what to do with the velvet dress, so they gave it to Mrs. Gibbs; perhaps to keep her mouth shut!"

"It's too bold, too monstrous." But Jacky was thinking of Lesard's contemptuous face, when he said Paul Marchmont wouldn't be troubled by burglars. Yet now she had little faith in Lesard.

"She wouldn't have dared to send it to be dyed!" she said at last.

"She knew where to send it, I suppose. There must be places," Gillian answered stoutly. "You and I must go, Jacky! We can hide and starve, but we can't go back to Marchmont's house. I think we'd better go now, tonight! I could hardly sit still downstairs. I looked round and saw the women, every one of them with diamonds worth a fortune; the Duchess of Mayborough was there, and she was one blaze of rubies. I felt like warning every one of them that I in my white satin and pearls was just a decoy. I could hardly talk."

The girl was trembling now, as she leaned back in her chintz-covered chair, her pale face with its big dilated eyes incongruously relieved against the gaily flowered background.

"I hate society, Jacky!" she cried wildly. "It is all such a conventional sham. Those rich, well-fed, careless women downstairs are so hard when you talk to them. They are civil to me because I'm Tom Hamilton's daughter, and my adopted father is rich; but if anything dreadful were to happen and I were turned out to the world tomorrow, not one of them would help me, or ever believe I was innocent."

"That man who took you in to dinner. Who was he?"

"Sir Charles Vivian," listlessly. "He was kind. He looked at me as if he were sorry for me. I don't know why."

Jacky remembered the set despair in her sister's face seen over the stairway, and knew why.

"He looked kind," she said simply. "Perhaps he might help us."

"We can't tell a wildcat story about a housekeeper's gown. And no man will help us, either. I trusted one—once!" and Jacky remembered the unburned letters in her trunk she had forgotten to destroy.

"No, there is only you and me against the world," Gillian went on. "And we'd better get out of this while we can. Come, Jacky, get ready and let us go now; we can get out of the window——"

"Wait, Gill!" Jacky, her eyes shut, was thinking hard. "We can't do that; it would make too much talk. We must wait till we get back to Hamilton Place. And besides——"

"Besides what?" quickly. "We can never get away from Hamilton Place. I know that if you don't."

"I want to wait for the ball." There was a queer look of hope in her eyes that were so strangely blue in her white-washed face. "I think I can make everything straight—at the ball."

"How? What do you mean?"

"I'll tell you, afterward; only let us keep quiet till then," Jacky said imploringly. "Then, if you like, we'll go."

And if she had only seen half of what that ball was to mean for her and Gillian she would sooner have gone out into the night and run from the terror of it till she dropped, than to have waited to face it in the warm, comfortable country house.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MASKED MONK.

Miss Hamilton's maid stood looking at herself in a long mirror with excited eyes. It was twelve o'clock; from downstairs she could hear the swaying, crashing music of the band from London, and it made her blood move in her veins.

Gillian's long, white satin gown, fitted her well enough, luckily they were both the same height; the loose silk domino hid all defects as the girl stared at herself, pulling up the gathered white chiffon hood till her dull red hair was hidden, fastening her black mask firmly across her eyes. Her lips were a little pale and set for a girl going to a ball, otherwise she was not noticeable one way or the other, where all the women would be dressed alike.

"Now for the hard part," she said, picking up a long pair of gloves. "And pray the saints I may not muddy my white satin shoes, and that none of the servants may come to ask after my headache! Not that it matters. They would only think I had gone to look on somewhere."

With a last glance at herself she put out all the lights, till only the moonlight from the unshuttered windows fell on her shimmering whiteness as she opened it wide. The night was cold, there would be no loving couples straying on the sodden garden paths, no eyes to see the hooded white shape that moved swiftly out on the wide terrace, down the steps to the sloping path and round to the conservatory door.

It was unlocked, as Gillian had said it would be, and noiselessly Jacky Hamilton slipped in. It was curious how calm she was! There was not a nerve quivering in all her body as she stood waiting for the signal that would bring Gillian. The band was silent now. When it struck up "The Blue Danube" Gill would come.

As quietly as though she were an ordinary invited guest Jacky waited behind a flowering orange-tree, and drank in the glorious heady scent of it. Colored lights shone dimly round her through hedges of flowering plants and palms, and the warm softness of the scented air made her lift her head, eager to begin the search for that strange Lesard who had forgotten her. The old haunting, dreaming swing of the waltz she was waiting for came on her ears like a far-off bugle; there was a rustling about her as couples moved away to the ballroom, and then almost before she knew it, Gillian stood by her.

"Come," she said in a breathless whisper, "get out into the ballroom, and we'll stand by the door as if we were waiting for partners. Be quick, before the crowd there melts away."

"Are the men in fancy dress?" Jacky held Gillian's arm.

"Some. Mr. Marchmont isn't. You can easily steer clear of him, anyhow, for he's in the cardroom. If anyone takes you for me let them, and dance with any man who asks you. It is quite safe. There must be five hundred people here—more! And about half of the women are in white dominoes like ours."

"All right, I'll manage." Jacky held her head high as she followed Gillian's quick feet through the conservatory into the ballroom. The lights made her blink as she stood among the shifting groups of women waiting for their partners; the music crashed in her ears. She gazed round her with keen, hard eyes. Where was the man who was straining her loyalty to its last strand?

She scanned each man who passed her, vainly. Some were in fancy dress, others in evening clothes, and not one of them had the splendid shoulders, the small head, the noiseless long step that were Lesard's. A voice at her ear made her turn quickly.

Gillian had vanished. Sir Charles Vivian, very splendid in immaculate evening dress, was stooping his handsome head to speak to her.

"Our dance, I think!" he said pleasantly, and she saw what a nice face he had, very fair and honest-eyed, with a small golden mustache that matched his hair.

"He thinks I'm Gil!" she had almost said it aloud in her dismay, when across the room she saw Gillian nodding at her violently. Jacky dared not speak. She moved to his side in silence and found herself dancing in stupid annoyance.

Yet, after all, perhaps it was better. She could look at every man she passed at close quarters in the wild hope that the next one might be Lesard.

Her partner danced beautifully, steering her deftly through the crowd; yet she laughed to herself as she kept pace with him; for his arm, though it was strong enough, had not Lesard's muscles of knitted steel. For a moment she forgot her distrust of him, forgot why she was here, as she remembered how his shoulder had felt like iron under her hand.

"Are you tired?" asked Sir Charles suddenly. He had a nice voice, and something in it made her start.

She shook her head.

"That's right," cheerfully. "I was afraid today that something had gone wrong, you were so white about the mouth."

"No, nothing was wrong!" She thought she could trust her voice that was so like Gillian's.

"You would not tell me if there were, I suppose," he answered, stopping. "But I'm going to ask you something, and you can answer me or not, as you like. Are you happy with old Marchmont? For you don't look it."

Jacky's heart contracted with sudden fright. She had never bargained for anything like this. Why—the man must like Gillian!

"And a good thing, too!" She took a swift look at his handsome, kindly face. "She needs someone to like her. But I wish I knew what to say."

"Well? Are you angry, and I impertinent?"

"I don't know," stammered Jacky. "I always look white."

Vivian laughed, though there was something not laughter in his mind.

"May I come to see you when you go home?" he demanded. "Though I don't think your guardian likes me much. Indeed, it is borne in on me that he doesn't approve of any young man."

It appeared more than likely to Jacky Hamilton, but she spoke on an impulse as Gillian never would have done.

"Do come, if you care to," she said, but she dared not look at him because her eyes were blue, instead of yellow gray.

"I suppose Marchmont won't kick me out!" rather ruefully.

"Don't come if you're afraid of him!" sweetly.

"I'm not afraid—of him!" Sir Charles had a gay alacrity in his voice that had not been there before. He had only known this girl since last night, but he was already hers to fetch and carry, and he had not yet heard her speak so kindly. Something, perhaps it was dancing, seemed to have melted her weary indifference.

"Perhaps you are afraid of me?" remarked Jacky coolly, and then laughed that clear, high laugh that was so much gayer than Gillian's, at the thought of Sir Charles Vivian being awed by Miss Hamilton's maid.

"You needn't laugh! I might be!" returned her partner, with a wild desire to tell her that she was the dearest, loveliest girl in the world, whom any man might fear to displease. "But I'll come to Hamilton Place all the same. Do you remember it all in your grandfather's time?"

"No! Nor in Noah's," mockingly. "I never——" she stopped, her pleasant gayety dead on her lips.

"I forgot—you were not born in those times!" he returned, laughing. But Jacky did not hear him. She was staring across the room, her eyes like blue steel through her black mask, her lips parted. A man in the brown habit of a monk, his cowl drawn down till his face was nearly hidden, was standing at the door; he wore a mask, too, that covered not his eyes and nose alone, but his mouth.

And yet she knew him!

Lesard—and alone, with no partner! Her chance was now or never. But there was Vivian, who thought she was Gill; for Gill's sake she dared not break away from him and run boldly to another man.

Yet she was pale with longing, wild with curbing her spirit that would leap before her to the man she loved. It did not seem so strange to her, either, that she should be here, as that he should have been that night in Marchmont's house. Lesard knew half the people in London.

Oh, if he would only stay where he was till this waltz was done!

"Shall we go on?" Vivian could not see how pale she was; how shaken.

She nodded; anything would be better than to stand here playing Gillian. The music seemed to surge about her in palpable waves as they circled the room; she could have touched Lesard as she passed him; but he did not even see her agonized eyes that tried to meet his. Time and again she was close to him, her feet keeping time mechanically to the lifting, swaying waltz, but he never saw her. His eyes were all over the room as he leaned motionless against the wall.

"That's a rum-looking monk," remarked Vivian as the music stopped. "I haven't seen him before. Eh! What do you say, Wellford?" as someone tapped him on the shoulder. "Lady Wellford wants to speak to me?" with a decent veil over his annoyance. "In one moment."

"Please go now," whispered the sham Gillian. "Don't make her cross."

"I don't see what she wants me for," aggrievedly. "And I can't leave you here."

"I'm all right. I see a man I know," breathlessly.

"Sure? Yes, Sir Simon—I'm coming," and he was towed off by his stout host to the joy of his bereft partner.

Now was her chance. She slipped swiftly round the room to Lesard's side.

"Oh, it's you!" she cried, a little quaver in her voice. "I couldn't believe my eyes."

The monk turned so sharply that he almost knocked against her. She could only see his eyes, and they were utterly blank of recognition as he looked down on her; yet she was sure he had started at the sound of her voice.

"Don't you know me?" she faltered. "Not me!" incredulously, with Lesard's eyes on her.

"I shall be delighted to, in future!" he said, his head thrown back with that gesture she loved.

"But it's I!" There were tears in her desperate, disappointed eyes. She put up one impetuous hand to tear off his mask, only to remember that Miss Hamilton's maid dare not. "You can't have forgotten me!"

"Not if I ever knew you," with Lesard's own civil, indifferent tone that he used to strangers.

Jacky looked at him, staggered. Was it her red hair, her face bleach? She remembered the mask and hood covered them.

"I'm Jacky——" she had the words on her very lips when she saw something in his eyes, and a sob choked her. He knew her; he had known her voice the instant she spoke! And he was acting now. Every drop of blood seemed to leave her heart and surge back again; a fury of anger made her gasp. Was this the man she had loved and nearly eaten her heart out trying to trust; this man who was lying to her now, all but his eyes that he could not master? The rage of hell was in her as she looked at him.

"As you like," her voice was dangerous. "I congratulate you on your memory."

"I told you before that it was short; I tell you now that it does not exist," the monk returned coolly, and before she could make sense of his words he was gone.

Dazed with wonder she stood looking after him. What was the matter with him? Was he out of his mind? or was he, perhaps, only cautious! If she followed him would he take off the mask from face and speech and be again the Lesard she knew?

She pushed past the people in the doorway as if they were figures in a dream. Surely it was a dream; it could not be true!

Before her the monk was moving leisurely toward the front door, as if he were going home. He did not look behind, but she kept at a safe distance. How absurd his long, noiseless stride was with this fluttering robe!—but she was faint and sick while she thought it and saw Lesard going away from her, leaving her cast aside like a squeezed orange.

He was going out the hall door; and she followed him. When he was outside she would speak to him, give him his ring from her finger, fling her love in his face. But when she was out in the dark there was no sign of him.

She drew out of the square blotch of light from the doorway and stood trembling with unreasoning terror. This dreadful ball—this man who lied to her in Lesard's voice—had taken the very life from her heart.

Like a lapwing she turned and scudded along the path that led to the terrace under her own window. She had only one thought—to get to safety and quiet. But she stopped as suddenly as she had fled, crushing her satins against a wet bush in dismay.

The monk was just in front of her, striding up the path—the terrace; in—was she dreaming?—her window.

"He's waiting there for me," she thought, and careless who saw her she flew after him up the terrace in the window.

The room was dark, as she left it, and she stumbled on the window-sill. A hand caught her wrist hard.

"Gill!" she cried sharply, for it was Gill's hand, hot and trembling, and she had left Gill downstairs. "Let me go! Who came in this window?"

"No one." Gillian's voice was broken, hoarse. "No one."

"But I saw someone."

"Jacky, you didn't. Oh, you didn't!" The wild, imploring whisper turned Jacky cold; was Gill lying, too?

"Are you crazy, or do you think I am?" she said angrily.

Gillian put her hand over her sister's mouth, and with a strength Jacky had never dreamed she possessed dragged her into an open cupboard.

"Don't speak, don't struggle," she whispered. "Keep still."

And Jacky, with sudden docility, obeyed her. For there was a cautious movement in the next room, a step that certainly was not Lesard's.

"Keep still, or we'll be murdered," said Gillian through her teeth, as the step came nearer.

Through the inch-wide crack of the cupboard door Jacky stared breathless. What did that quiet footfall mean? Through all the crash of the band downstairs it was loud to her strained ears. Oh, who was it?

And then Gillian held her with the strength of one possessed.

A man had come into the range of the crack; a small, bullet-headed man that Jacky knew, and he had a lot of small, black boxes in his arms, that he sat down in the square of moonlight from the window. With all her strength she tried to wrench from Gillian's hold.

The man was a robber; she must stop him!

But even as she thought this, Gill's hand was on her mouth.

"Do you want to die?" she breathed in Jacky's ear. "Keep still!"

But it was not that whisper that turned Jacky Hamilton cold, and slowed the very life in her blood.

Another voice was in her ears, and she would rather have lain dead than have heard it.

"Got the things? All right, then, we'll start. They'll be dancing for hours yet."

Gillian, like a mad woman, dragged Jacky's head down, crushing her face against her shoulder until she could neither see nor breathe.

"What was that?" said the small man sharply.

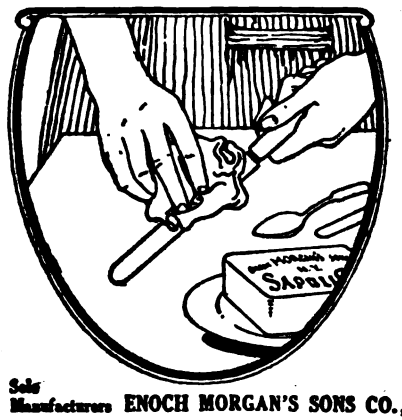
"Nothing! The girl's downstairs. I saw her. Come on," sneeringly, "unless you're waiting for dawn."

Gillian closed her eyes, not to see as the monk passed the telltale crack, and, like a flash, both men were gone. If they had stayed one minute longer they must have heard Jacky Hamilton as she fought desperately out of Gillian's arms.

"Gill!" she cried furiously, "are you such a coward as this? Oh, I never thought you were a coward. Go, run—tell someone!" she stamped her foot at her own weakness—for it was not Jacky Hamilton who could betray the man whose kisses had taught her life and love.

"Go!" she reiterated, sick and faint, "or I must—and I know him."

"You! Know him?" Gillian swayed where she stood. "Not like I do," she was muttering. "He's my husband. Oh, if I could only die!"



"Your husband!" Jacky cried out, as if a knife had touched her heart. "Who? Which?" she thrust out her hands as though she could push away the terror that was coming.

"The monk!—Lesard. Jacky," with chattering teeth, "we can't tell! For God's sake promise me you won't tell!"

But Jacky was past telling anything. She had fainted.

How Stuart's Calcium Wafers Work Out to the Skin and Clear it of Pimples, Blackheads, Boils, Muddiness and Such Blemishes.

The manner in which Stuart's Calcium Wafers influence a beautiful complexion is one of nature's marvels. Their first action is to remove the sour fermentations that are apt to poison the blood and thus disfigure the skin. Then the calcium itself is a natural agency to skin health and is appropriated by the tissues for its own particular use in repair work. These effects are visibly noticeable to those troubled with a pimply skin, or one that is muddy or red or blotchy, scaly and rough and coarse. The Calcium Wafers induce a reaction to healthier tendencies and soon the pinkish complexion begins to assert itself, the blemishes fade away, the dimples seem animated and the entire appearance is one of vivacious beauty instead of unsightliness.

MOTHERS of many children know what a strenuous time awaits them as bedtime creeps around, so many things to be done before sleep can visit the weary eyelids.

But the woman who wants always to look her best is something like that busy mother, for bedtime should be her hour for many little duties in connection with her toilet.

Let us consider one of them.

The hair is one of the possessions of woman which has a large part to play in making her beautiful or the reverse, and she should regard it with respect and be willing to give it the best of care and attention. At night, which is the quiet time of the day, when one can have time to one's self as a rule, she should put it to bed as carefully as ever a mother cared for her small children.

If it is long hair, and in spite of the vogue of the "bob" there is plenty of long hair still, she should let it down and after combing it thoroughly and brushing it with long even strokes which reach the scalp without scratching it, air it thoroughly. To do this, she should pass her hands under the mass of hair at the nape of the neck or at the sides of the head, and lift and toss it until there is no slightest chance that any perspiration or moisture lingers. This should be done near an open window, and the hair should be let hang while the rest of the evening toilet is completed. It should be wiped off carefully with a soft towel to be sure that no dust of the day may linger, and the scalp should be massaged for five or ten minutes. To do this, slip the flat of the fingers under the hair on each side of the head, and pressing tight against the scalp move it forward and back and round and round on the skull, being careful not to rub the fingers back and forth across the hair. Go over the entire head in this manner.

If the hair is bobbed, the task is much simpler. It is easy to air bobbed hair, and indeed it gets an airing every hour of the day, but nevertheless it needs a thorough combing and brushing at night, just as if it were long. The scalp should be massaged, but it is a simpler process with short hair. Part the hair from forehead to nape of neck, and with the forefingers placed side by side, massage vigorously across the part, inch by inch. Part the hair in another place and do the same, and so continue until every part of the scalp has received this intensive massage.

Do not use big heavy feather pillows to make your head hot, but loosely stuffed pillows or no pillow at all. In the morning air your hair once again before putting it up.

Once in two weeks, if your scalp is dry or shows an inclination to produce dandruff, use a medicine dropper to run olive oil along part after part in your hair until the whole scalp is thoroughly oiled. Then tie your head up in a towel, or slip on a rubber bathing cap, and go to bed, following this treatment with a thorough shampoo in the morning.

Answers to Questions

PORT ARTHUR.—Blackheads indicate not enough attention to the care of the skin. Take your daily body bath, of course, frictioning the skin gently in drying and washing, and in addition when you go to bed give the face a thorough cleansing in warm soapy water, using a Turkish wash-cloth or a camel's-hair complexion brush. Do not get a brush of stiffer hair than camel's hair. Then rinse many, many times in warm water, and finally cool. A special treatment for a bad case of blackheads is as follows: After the nightly scrubbing and rinsing, massage into the skin a little boracic powder and finish by rubbing a tiny bit of cold cream over the face. Once a week, after the washing of the face at night, rinse in hot water and cover skin with a thick coat of blackhead jelly, letting it remain on for ten minutes, then wash off and massage the face for several minutes. Omit the boracic powder that night. This is irritating to the skin, since it removes all oil, but it can be done until the blackheads are removed, then you should see that they do not return. Friction the skin gently with the flattened fingers of the hands, several times a day, to stimulate it to throw off the secretions of the pores. Your brown neck can be bleached, then given careful daily bathing and a little massaging with a good cold cream. I should give some thought to my diet as well; you are probably not getting enough vegetables and fruits or drinking enough water, while getting too many heavy foods and sweet stuffs.

Recipe for Blackhead Jelly

Pare a slice of Castile soap into three cups of water to which has been added one teaspoonful of powdered borax. Boil until somewhat reduced in quantity; then let stand until it jellies.

Bleach for a Brown Neck

One ounce of strained honey, one teaspoonful of lemon juice, six drops of oil of bitter almonds (this is poison; be careful not to leave it within reach of children, and use it only externally); whites of two eggs, enough very fine oatmeal to make a fine paste. Spread this on a long strip of cotton cloth, three inches in width, and tie as a bandage about the throat. Do not use this on the face but only on the throat. Four or five applications should accomplish the bleach.

E. K.—An oily skin may mean several things, but ordinarily it indicates that your digestion is not in proper order. Regulate your diet and bowel action at once, by good plain foods and plenty of water, cutting out sweets, fried foods and food that is not easily digested, such as pork and veal. Bathe daily, of course, and friction the skin with a bath mitten after bathing. You can make a bath mitten out of Turkish toweling, to slip on one hand with which to rub the body. Use plenty of warm soapy water for bathing, then rinse thoroughly in warm water, then in cool, following with a frictioning of the entire skin. You need exercise as well. Practice any and all of the exercises given by me in COMFORT from time to time. I should not use a facial bleach at present until I had whitened my skin by a change of diet. That is probably all that it needs. And a bleach would do no good without a change of eating habits. See that you take a certain amount of exercise daily, both in and outdoors. Don't forget to chew your food until it is liquid before swallowing. If you are following my answers in COMFORT, you saw my letter to "R. R." last month. Heed the suggestions about bowel habits.

BET.—So you are one of the girls who has bobbed her hair and doesn't like it. For young girls it is rather pretty, I think, but I always hate to see pretty hair fall under the barber's shears. Now that yours is cut, make the best of it. A pretty way to dress it is to part it in the middle, then curl the ends of the hair under so that it makes a sort of roll about the nape of the neck. It needs to be kept very fluffy, and curled, unless you are willing to go to the other extreme which is equally fashionable, and wear your hair perfectly straight and uncurled. In such case, it is usually parted on the right side and brushed toward the other side, not back, held above the ear with a barette; and it should hang a little long and without the touch of a curling iron. If the hair is black and quite thick, this is a very smart way to wear it. If you want it to grow out again, as you apparently do, keep the scalp clean, the hair well brushed each night, and massage the scalp nightly, running the fingers under the hair, pressing firmly on the scalp and moving it back and forth on the skull, so that it is kept loose from the skull. Shampoo once in two weeks, or three at the most. As your hair begins to grow, curl the ends under, and when longer, roll them under around the neck. This gives a bobbed effect while letting the hair grow. If you curl your bobbed hair do not make the mistake of curling it too much. Use rather a large curling iron and quite a little hair at a time, so that the wave will be a large loose one, not a tight frizzy one. I shouldn't curl it all over my head either unless my hair was very lank and clung to my head, then I should use curling irons on it enough to make it stand out a little. Don't have your irons too hot, try them on paper first to be sure they will not scorch. Curling irons are really bad for the hair. Watch the fashion magazines to see how bobbed hair is worn, and this will help you in caring for your own.

J. C. O.—The knees that hurt you to straighten are probably rheumatic. Have you seen a doctor? Don't let rheumatism go unattended, for it can cause lots of trouble. How are teeth and tonsils? Physicians nowadays say that rheumatism comes from some infection, and the thing to do is to find that source of infection—tonsils and teeth are the two most frequent sources. Keep the teeth thoroughly cared for, brushing them with some good dentifrice on rising in the morning, again after each meal, and again before retiring. In this way you will not only have beautiful teeth, which add greatly to one's beauty, but you will avoid visits to the dentist's chair and many ills which have their rise in teeth conditions. Give your throat attention. If it is sore or irritated, gargle with some good antiseptic solution, such as one tablespoonful of Dobell's solution to six teaspoonfuls of water. How about your nose? Watch out for little colds. Keep the bowels open and you will be less inclined to take colds. In the meantime hot baths or applications are good for stiff and inflamed joints. See that they are wrapped up just after the hot steaming or the hot cloths have been wrapped about them (hot wet cloths, not dry ones), so that they will not become chilled by immediate exposure to the air. Keep them warm at all times. Watch out for your diet, so that you eat foods that are easily digested and will not constipate you, for you should keep the bowels open. And of course drink lots of water. As to your other question, take your bath just the same, but be careful not to get chilled. If you have a bathtub, see that the water is hot and bathe quickly, rubbing the body briskly after, and dressing at once. If you haven't a tub, slip a warm bathrobe or other garment around yourself when disrobed, and only expose a small portion of the body at a time, as you stand on a folded bathtowel. For instance, bathe the right arm, then dry, rubbing vigorously, then the left arm, then uncover one shoulder, and bathe that, and so on, until the whole body has been gone over. As fast as a portion is bathed, cover it up so that at all times the body is warm. You will feel better for the bath, and you will not take cold if you do not allow any portion of the body to become chilled. Have the towel on which you stand warmed, if it is a cool day. The cleaner you can keep your body at all times, the healthier it will be, and the more comfortable you will feel. Use warm water, of course, not cold. About boils, they indicate impure blood, and the only way to cure them is to keep the bowels free, watch the diet, and keep perfectly clean. Try eating prunes every morning that you have soaked all night drinking plenty of water, eating spinach, cutting out sweets and fat meats, and taking plenty of fruit. Pineapple is good for stomach conditions, oranges are a very mild stimulant of the bowels, figs and prunes are excellent, and an apple eaten every night and thoroughly chewed is excellent for the bowels. Baked apples for dessert are good for your condition, in fact all fruits except bananas, which you should avoid, and most green vegetables will be desirable.

N. C.—You didn't give a nom de plume, but will probably guess this is meant for you. The "red bumps" on your face are the result, no doubt of imperfect digestion and elimination. The dark rings under the eyes may be the result of different things. You are at an age when your body is undergoing changes and that may be the reason. Keep yourself warm, well bathed, get plenty of sleep, fresh air, good sensible food, and all these things will adjust themselves shortly. Be very careful about eating good nourishing food, won't you, my dear? for whether you know it or not your body is busy now laying the foundations for the kind of woman you are to be, and you certainly want to be healthy, pretty and happy. You should eat for breakfast some fruit, then a great bowl of cereal and cream, such as cooked oatmeal (cooked a long time), cream of wheat, Pettijohn's breakfast food or any other of the cereals which require cooking, or a big bowl of the ready-to-eat cereals of which there are so many good ones on the market. With this eat thin buttered toast, and a soft-boiled egg. You could even have two eggs, but be sure they are cooked not longer than three and one-half minutes, and taken out of the shell at once before they have a chance to get hard. The white of hard eggs is difficult for the stomach to digest. Drink plenty of water between meals, keep the body perfectly clean, and for your other two meals eat nourishing foods, baked potato and some lamb, mutton or beef, chicken, fish. A bowl of soup is good for your evening meal. For desserts don't eat very rich ones, since they are hard to digest, but baked custard, baked apples or other fruit, corn-starch pudding, ice cream, apple sauce. Don't eat pie or very rich cake (simple cake won't hurt you in moderation), or rich pudding sauces.

PRETTY.—My dear, at thirteen you have no business using any of the things you mention. Your skin should be let alone and allowed to be as pretty as it naturally would be. You will only harm your skin by indulging in all such things. You need lots of exercise, good food, lots of water, plenty of sleep, and every-day bathing. Keep your hair clean by shampooing once in three weeks, or even in two. Brush it gently at night and braid it loosely before going to bed. Brush your teeth as I have told "J. C. O." With this attention to your toilet, your skin will daily grow lovelier, and your health better, and you will be glad that you followed my advice. When you are many years older, it will be time to indulge in cosmetics, when your skin has blemishes and needs artificial aid. Give it proper care now, and you won't need such aid for a long time, and you will grow prettier daily.

ALICE.—See answer to "Port Arthur." About the oily hair, I wonder if you rinse it thoroughly when shampooing? And what do you use for a shampoo? Try using white household soap shaved into boiling water, then dissolved over a flame, and the liquid poured a little at a time on the head, when cool enough. Of course rub and massage scalp and hair vigorously after pouring on liquid, until it is a mass of soapsuds, then rinse thoroughly; use more shampoo liquid, more rubbing, more rinsing; and finally, when you are through, rinse many, many times. This is where it may be the cause of your trouble. You may not get out all the soap and it may clog the little oil glands and cause them to be irritated and discharge more oil than they should. Have the scalp perfectly clean and dry, with not a speck of dandruff, and the hair itself dry and fluffy. Look after the eliminative functions of the body also, and your stomach. Good digestion is at the back of healthful conditions of the scalp as well as of the other parts of the body. You could try using a teaspoonful of borax in your shampoo water, if your hair continues oily after a careful shampooing, rinsing, etc., as directed above. But the best way is to eliminate the condition that is causing the oiliness.

YOU HAVE A BEAUTIFUL FACE
But Your Nose?

IN THIS DAY AND AGE attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible, for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. Permit no one to see you looking otherwise; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My latest Nose-Shaper, "TRADOS Model 25", U. S. Patent, with six adjustable pressure regulators and made of light polished metal, corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation, quickly, safely and permanently. Diseased cases excepted. Does not interfere with one's work, being worn at night.

when we were secretly married—but—if—this other—woman is his wife—what am I? What am I?" she repeated, passionately beating with open palms upon old Aaron's breast—"and—what is—my child—that is coming——?"

The old man suddenly began shaking as if in the grip of some mighty force. "Not that—Mary"—he protested—"not that!"

But Mary's eyes met his appealingly. "Yes—Gran'ther—yes. What shall I do?" she asked piteously.

As Mary answered, a dazed expression crossed old Aaron's face—he reached towards her blindly—then a horrible sound came from his throat and with frothing lips he pitched forward at her feet—and Mary kneeling beside the prostrate figure realized the man who had been a father to her was dead—she was alone in the world—and the unspeakable anguish of aloneness filled her soul.

* * * * *

With the death of Aaron Deed Mary's condition became known, and gossiping tongues began to lash her mercilessly, giving her no opportunity to explain—only one of all she had befriended coming to her in her black hour of need—Jane Stairs.

"If you will let me and little Zach stay," said Jane when she made her appearance at the Deed's cabin, "I'll look after you for what you've done for me and mine in the past."

Mary, with a heart-breaking little smile, crept into the arms of the woman whose false step had branded an outcast among Deed's Cove inhabitants, and said: "Please stay."

Going back a few days later to resume her school, Mary found the door of the little church locked and tacked upon it was a crude sign bearing these words:

"The likes of you can't teach our young."

This outspoken expression of the people brought the first tears Mary had known since her Gran'ther's death, and with the tears came the benumbing revelation that she had been tricked into a sham marriage and then discarded—like Jane Stairs, she no longer held a place of respectability among her people, yet in the blackness of it all a ray of hope suddenly beamed.

Zane Bradley knew of her marriage—a minister at Creighton's Landing had performed the marriage rites—it was only a matter of finding them to establish her rights. But a trip to Creighton's Landing blocked out the avenue of hope through the minister—there was no such name recorded among the ministers of the little village—nor did the court register show a license. Crushed and broken in spirit she returned to Deed's Cove, the hope that even Zane would be powerless to help her dying in her breast as she mechanically fastened the boat at the water's edge and made her way towards the cabin.

Zane Bradley, surrounded by every luxury, found Paris in its gayest season dull and uninteresting; through his beautifully draped windows overlooking the Seine, he remembered with aching heart the silver sands of Deed's Cove as it was in the springtime, remembered the sunset as he and Mary had gone out to cast the fish-net—remembered the wonder and beauty and contentment that had been his in that far-away spot—and his present was as dead sea fruit—he felt the rebellion of one who has relinquished one after another the desirable things of life to no purpose.

While at Deed's Cove Mary watched from her window a desolate wintry sea, sobbing along a frozen, desolate shore—she also remembered the vanished springtime—Zane—and the glory of the sunset and the beauty of life * * * * it seemed to her the crushing misery of a thousand years lay between them and the present. And Jane coming in presently, found a little figure crouching before the easy-chair old Aaron Deed had used, in an attitude of despair.

Minutes dragged into hours, hours into days and days into months—all colorless, monotonous and miserable—until near the close of winter a little child was born into the world—a little son over whom Mary wept aching tears when Jane placed the small, warm bundle into her arms, then as if by magic, life suddenly became a grand, solemn and glorious thing.

Then springtime with its musical winds, bright sunshine and returning birds came to Deed's Cove. Its footprints were in evidence on every hand—butterflies and blooming things that make the human heart glad, came more abundantly with each new day—but in one heart the desolation of winter still lingered, for in Deed's cabin Mary bending over her baby in an agony of anxiety, realized the little life for which she was responsible was slipping away. Mutely refusing the rest which Jane insisted on her taking, she continued asking piteously at regular intervals if the doctor was yet in sight. And when at last he came, he held out to the anxious mother little hope for the sick child, saying he could do no more than had already been done—then he went away with the air of one who thought it just as well a nameless offspring should die young.

And when he had gone, Mary, remembering the words of old Aaron concerning infant damnation without baptism, stumbled slowly to her feet from the bedside, an overwhelming fear taking possession of her.

"Jane, Jane," she cried anxiously, "suppose it were true what Gran'ther believed about infant damnation without baptism——"

"That's Bible teachin', Miss Mary," Jane answered hoarsely. "We ain't got the right to dispute it."

That her child was dying—dying without the hope of heaven—chilled the very marrow in the sorrowing mother's bones.

"What right have I," she cried piteously, "to deny a helpless little babe that which might mean its salvation?"

As if in answer to her agonized question she turned her gaze on the east window and through it saw the steeple of the little church, and remembered it was the Sabbath.

In the little church at Deed's Cove it was "service hour." The sunlight fell through the small, high windows in splashes of gold. The wind stirred the pines clustered about it and sent the loose needles down in showers on the shingle roof.

Warren Slayden, the minister, had closed the ponderous book before him, having already taken his text. His was a narrow congregation and he preached a narrow creed. Old, middle-aged and young were in the audience, yet only the sound of Slayden's voice broke the stillness. To most of the congregation religion was a solemn, awful thing—something to shudder over—to measure men and women by—a thing void of joyousness or comfort.

Slayden repeated his text unctuously—"Judge not that ye be not judged. With whatsoever judgment ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

As if in direct refutation of the fitness of the text, at that moment through the open door and up the narrow aisle came Mary Deed—beside her Jane Stairs carrying the babe that had brought down the wrath of Deed's Cove upon Mary's head—and close behind them walked little Zach, who so loved life that his lips were ever wreathed in smiles, though often it was a wistful smile and rarely ever answered.

Straight up to the foot of the pulpit went the little procession, and Slayden stepped down to meet them.

"For what have you come?" he asked, eying them critically.

"My—my baby is—dying——" stammered Mary. "I would have you administer baptism."

Before Slayden could speak the refusal already on his lips, an old man rose in the "Amen corner."

"No!" he thundered, shaking an angry finger at the group, "not in the house of God shall the child of a "loose" woman be baptized—as Deacon in this church I forbid it—Warren Slayden—I forbid it!"

And Slayden looking from his congregation to Mary and back again slowly shook his head.

In the back of the church Jim Cody looked on in silence, his face working strangely. Suddenly it dawned upon his sinful heart that Zach, the little boy clinging to Jane's skirts, had never been baptized—he, like the baby in her arms, was subjected to infant damnation. The same rule that had prevented Zack from infant baptism would hold good now—the little church at Deed's Cove had never sheltered a fallen woman—but was it right? Truth slashed his heart, he half rose from the rough bench on which he sat, then sank back and leaning forward hid his face upon his arms.

One after another of the onlookers to whom little Mary Deed had been an angel of mercy, half rose in protest, but the stern faces of those who agreed with Warren Slayden outnumbered the would-be defenders, and Mary, reading the signs aright, looked from Slayden to her baby in Jane Stair's arms, and her own grief-drawn face grew stern and tense with bitterness—but her baby was dying—the doctor had said so—and because it had no proof of its right to live, these people refused it baptism! Would she stand by and see her own child damned?

Suddenly into her eyes came a look of blazing defiance—she thrust Slayden aside as if he had been a straw, and faced the audience.

"I am not a loose woman," she cried. "My marriage is legal in the sight of God, because it was performed by a man in minister's robe and in God's name, and because I thought it was legal—but man-made laws are as nothing beside those of the Master Law-maker. If the Bible teaches infant damnation without baptism, what right have you—who call yourself 'righteous—people of God'—to refuse a little helpless child salvation? My baby shall not be denied its right to heaven. If this is worthy to administer baptism," she went on excitedly, pointing a finger of scorn at the minister, "then so am I—and with you as witness I will baptize my own child."

Glancing about, Mary discovered the minister had removed the water pitcher from its accustomed place, but on a little table, covered with a snowy cloth, was the wine of the sacrament, and before anyone could foretell her purpose, the mother, snatching the glass bottle from its place, had poured the red wine into her hand, and with lifted face, sprinkled the babe in Jane Stairs' arms—clear as a bugle call her voice rang out through the little church:

"In Thy name, O Christ Jesus, with the emblem of Thy blood—which was shed for all—I baptize this child—Aaron Sidney Creighton—and by this same token heal, O God, heal that which is sick—Amen."

The influence of something holy and beautiful was suddenly abroad in the room. The preacher stood with bowed head—in the grip of an emotion long unfelt—Jim Cody shook with repressed sobs. But the old man who had first spoken, crossed the room to Mary's side, and twisting the wine bottle from her hand, held it high above his head.

"This," he cried shrilly—"the sacred sacrament has been defiled. We have set back and let a harlot make a mockery of Jesus Christ. Are we going to stand for it—are we?—are——"

Before he could finish, Jim Cody had swung himself over the benches and was facing the speaker and Warren Slayden with clenched fists.

make a dough just stiff enough to handle. Do not knead the dough, but take a small amount at a time onto the floured board, pat into shape and roll fairly thin. Use deep, clean fat for doughnuts, have it very hot but not smoking. Do not put enough doughnuts into the kettle at one time so they will crowd as they rise to the top of fat. Turn when well puffed on one side, and then again to fully brown and cook.

CANDIED POP-CORN.—One and one-half cup of hot water, two cups of sugar and one and one-half cup of corn syrup cooked until a little dropped in cold water at once becomes brittle. Remove from fire and stir in one tablespoon of butter. Have ready about five quarts of well-popped corn that has been picked free from unpopped kernels, salted and tossed in a large pan. Dish into a second pan so as to avoid any salt that does not cling to the corn, and pour over the hot syrup. Stir and spread in a large tin to cool. If a pop-corn cake is desired, the popped corn may be put through the food chopper, using the coarse cutter.

Late Canning

As soon as the pumpkins and squash show signs of moisture on the outside the wise housekeeper knows that specks of rot will soon appear and that she will lose two of her most useful vegetables. The canning of pumpkin and squash is not common, but it should be, for it is highly satisfactory.

Whether for immediate table use, or for canning, most pumpkins and squash are of a better flavor and consistency if baked instead of boiled, to say nothing of its being a much simpler process. First wash the vegetable, cut into two or more pieces, remove center, place in a double cooker or between two pans of the same size and bake until thoroughly softened. Scoop from the shell, mash with one teaspoon of salt to each quart, fill glass jars, adjust soft, fresh rubbers, partly seal and cook three hours in a hot water bath after the water begins to boil hard. Seal.

PREPARING AND CANNING CHICKEN.—Select chickens that are plump and not over fat. Pluck dry, as scalding injures the appearance of the canned product. Remove pin-feathers and singe. Place in a pan of tepid water and scrub well with a cloth, using a little hard soap. Rinse well and wipe dry. A small pointed knife, a sharp meat knife and a pair of kitchen scissors will make neat and rapid work of the disjointing and carving. The chicken is cut into about 12 pieces.

Place the chicken on a meat board, back up, and with the scissors make a long incision through the skin of the neck from the shoulders to within one inch of the head, then cut around the neck. Lay back the skin from the neck, loosen it from the windpipe and gullet as far back as the crop. Disjoint and cut off the neck. With the pointed knife make an incision through to the wish-bone, scrape the meat away and remove it, as this makes the packing easier.

Place the chicken breast up, disjoint and cut off the wings, removing and discarding the wing tip. Disjoint and cut off the legs at the hip joint, then separate the first and second joints, making four pieces in all.

Begin at the shoulder joints where the wings were removed and cut down through the white muscles that indicate a joint in the ribs to a point one inch above the vent, using the scissors. Lift the breast clear from the back, cutting away any membrane that adheres to the crop. This leaves all the organs undisturbed in the back. Cut a large circle away from the vent and carefully remove the entrails, then all the other organs, and from them remove the liver, heart and gizzard. Care must be taken not to break the gall bladder. For canning use the breast cut into four or six pieces, the two wings, the four leg portions and the two round pieces of dark meat in back of the hip.

Place the meat in a cool place. Take what remains of the chicken frame, the cleaned gizzard and heart chopped fine, the wing tips and neck, and cover with cold water. Bring slowly to a boil and cook until the meat separates from the bones. Strain and pour enough over the meat to hardly cover, and very slowly simmer until about two-thirds done, keeping the kettle closely covered. Carefully fill the jars about three-quarters full of the chicken, add salt and fill with the hot liquor. Partly seal, cook in a hot water bath three and one-half hours with water nearly to shoulders of jars. Seal.

To serve, the chicken may be fried brown in butter and then placed in a dish where it will keep warm. Add a little more butter to the frying-pan, smooth in some dry flour, add the chicken liquor heated and cook five minutes. Season and pour over the chicken.

See How Easy It Is To Learn Music This New Way

YOU know how easy it is to put letters together and form words, once you have learned the alphabet. Playing a musical instrument is not very much different. Once you learn the notes, playing melodies on the mandolin, piano or violin is simply a matter of putting the notes together correctly.

The first note shown above is F. Whether you are singing from notes, playing the piano or banjo or any other musical instrument, that note in the first space is always F. The four notes indicated are F, A, C, E, easy to remember, because they spell the word "face." Certain strings on the mandolin, certain keys on the piano, represent these same notes—and once you learn them, playing melodies on the instrument is largely a matter of following the notes.

Anyone can now learn to play a musical instrument at home, without a teacher. A new simplified method of teaching reduces all music to its simplest possible form. You can now master singing, piano-playing, or any musical instrument you wish right at home, quickly, easily, without endless study and practice.

Practice is essential, of course—but it's fun the new way. You'll begin to play melodies almost from the start. The "print and picture" method of self-teaching is fascinating; it's simply a matter of following one interesting step after another. You learn that the note in the first space is F, and that a certain key on the piano is F. Thereafter you will always be able to read F and play it whenever you see it. Just as you are able to recognize the letters that make a word, you will be able to recognize and play the notes that make a melody. It's easy, interesting.

You don't have to know anything whatever about music to learn to play a musical instrument this new way. You don't have to pin yourself down to regular hours, to regular classes. You practice whenever you can, learn as quickly as you please. All the intricate "mysteries" of music have been reduced to a method of amazing simplicity—each step is made as clear as ABC. Thousands have already learned to play their favorite musical instruments this splendid new quick way.

You Can Play Your Favorite Instrument Three Months From Today

If you are dissatisfied with your present work, let music act as a stepping-stone into a new career. If you long for a hobby, a means of self-expression, let music be the new interest in your life. If you wish to be a social favorite, if you wish to gain popularity—choose your favorite instrument and, through the wonderful home-study method of the U. S. School of Music, play it three months from today.

You can do it. Youngsters of 10 to 12 years have done it, and men as old as 60 have found new interest and enjoyment in learning how to play a musical instrument. You don't have to listen while others entertain any longer. YOU can be the center of attraction, the talented person who holds the audience fascinated.

Is it the piano you wish to play, the mandolin, the violin, the saxophone? Do you want to learn how to sing from notes? Are you eager to be able to play "jazz" on the clarinet, the banjo?

Are Diseases Inherited?

THIS subject is taken for this month's talk not to advance anybody's pet theories nor to present arguments for or against the various rules laid down by different authorities, but to present some reasonable conclusions and some helpful suggestions. I think at one time it was believed by many people that at a certain time in their lives they must expect and submit to certain diseases just because their ancestors at a certain age had been afflicted with these diseases. This is true to some extent, and it is unfortunate that in some specific diseases the sins of the fathers and mothers are handed down from generation to generation. It is not true in all cases, and in one disease, tuberculosis, we can be positive that a baby born healthy, no matter what its family history may be, has a fighting chance.

A baby born of a mother who has tuberculosis is very likely to have tuberculosis in some form or other, as the mother's blood, which is infected, feeds the baby in utero. A baby born with this affliction is likely early in life to have tuberculosis of some of the organs of excretion, intestines, kidneys, lungs or tubercular meningitis.

A baby born whose father has tuberculosis has as good a chance as any healthy baby if proper precautions are followed out.

Formerly it was believed by many that if the father became tubercular at the age of 30 or 35 his children at or about that time in their lives must expect to become afflicted with this same disease.

This is not true, and we should take into consideration the fact that the father may have had some predisposing cause that made him a victim of this disease. Not something he inherited, but something he acquired, like pneumonia not properly treated, chronic indigestion, inflammation of the kidneys, irritating gases in army or in private life, that made his system or organs a good soil for the germs of tuberculosis to operate in. A baby inherits some things from its parents, his physique, color of its eyes, if parents are slight or stout the baby will be likewise, if narrow of shoulders or slight of chest the baby will be inclined to be the same.

Right here is where one can be helpful to the baby, and the right time to begin is early in life.

If the baby's parents have not a good chest development, this tendency in the baby can be overcome by deep breathing and exercises that will develop the chest and lungs and eliminate this inherited tendency.

Good fresh air, good nourishing food with plenty of sleep with healthful exercise has taken from many a child the name of being a weakling and placed him among the strong, healthy class. The making of a noted athlete of a child should not be the goal to strive for, but to raise the general standard of all babies and children should be the object to be achieved.

If you suspect that your baby has inherited some disease from some ancestor, no matter how remote, it is your duty to have its blood examined, and if your suspicions are correct have baby treated until the disease is eradicated. This breaks up the line of infection and you not only protect the child but you also protect future generations.

If your ancestors or immediate family have been contending with tuberculosis, get your children's chests and lungs in such a healthy and well-developed condition that the germs will not find fertile soil for propagating. This is the hope of this country's future, right living, proper food, proper exercise to overcome the weaknesses they may have inherited from their ancestors.

A baby born whose mother has tuberculosis must not nurse, but must be put at once on modified milk or some prepared food. If either of the parents or some member of the household has tuberculosis, great care must be taken to protect the baby and its food from infection. The excretions from the tubercular patient must be cared for, all dishes used by them thoroughly scalded and their clothing boiled.

A person with tuberculosis should not be allowed to care for your baby in any way.

The terrible, unhygienic habit of insisting that your baby kiss every relative or friend that may call is a cruel thing and its evil possibilities and probabilities far exceed imagination.

All of these sources of infection must be taken into consideration, also the danger of baby getting milk from a tubercular cow or cows.

To me the dangers from these sources seem more important than the idea that you may inherit something from your ancestors, the latter a possibility, the former a fact. The proposition that we must do something in this country to lessen the number of deaths in children under two years of age is becoming the subject of much discussion and consideration. I think the most important feature of the discussion should be preventive measures, measures that can be presented to the people as a whole, not to a few scientific people for limited action and results.

If you and I can learn to protect our babies from tuberculosis and other diseases, how much better it will be than to learn how to treat them when afflicted.

Questions and Answers

FEEDING BABY.—I am an expectant mother and would like to put baby at once on cow's milk. Will you give me information in regard to diluting milk?

MRS. L. W., Hanna City, Ill.

A.—Would suggest the following for the first two weeks: cream two and one-half ounces, water seventeen ounces, lime-water one-half ounce, sugar of milk one-half teaspoonful. This gives ten feedings, two ounces at a feeding. Baby should be fed every two hours, with two night feedings until three weeks old. For third and fourth weeks, cream five ounces, water twenty-four ounces, sugar of milk one-half teaspoonful, lime-water one ounce. This gives ten feedings, with three ounces at a feeding. The cream and water formula can be used until baby is four weeks old; then I would suggest milk two ounces, water four ounces, sugar of milk one-half teaspoonful; keep increasing the amount of milk gradually until the sixth month when the baby ought to be able to take as much milk as water, milk three ounces, water three ounces, sugar of milk one teaspoonful. You gradually keep increasing the percentage of milk until the ninth month, when the baby should be taking pure milk, with the addition of lime-water, and sugar of milk.

NURSING MOTHER.—I have a four-months-old baby that I am nursing, and he is very healthy, but I should like to know what to do to improve my own health. I feel very weak and nervous and noise disturbs me.

MRS. A. F. E., Huntington, Ind.

A.—It may be that nursing the baby is too much for you, considering your slight physique. Get some Neoferrum or Pepto-Mangan (Gude's), and take dessertspoonful doses in milk three times a day. For your nerves take every three hours a tablet containing one grain each of valerianate of iron, quinine and zinc. If after a reasonable time you do not feel stronger it might be well to wean baby.

BABY'S EYES AND MOUTH.—I am an expectant mother and am writing to ask what to use to wash out baby's mouth the first weeks of life, also solution to use in eyes to prevent blindness.

MRS. C. J. B., Cassatt, S. C.

A.—A good mouth wash is Glycothymoline, one teaspoonful to tablespoonful of warm water. For the eyes use a few drops of twenty per cent Argyrol solution, or two drops of one per cent Nitrate of Silver solution, as soon as baby is born. Use this only once.

Every day when bathing, baby's eyes should be washed out with Boracic Acid solution, one-half teaspoonful to one-half glass of warm water.

NERVOUS INDIGESTION.—I am the mother of six children, the baby being two months old. I have not been well since baby came, very nervous, with pain between shoulders and on top of head, also have local discharge constantly.

MRS. J. B., So. Norfolk, Va.

A.—You do not mention the ages of the other children, but it may be that too frequent pregnancies have weakened your general health. Would suggest that you wean the baby, if nursing it, and try and build up your strength. Keep the bowels regular, get out in the open air away from the children and your household cares all you can. Take Neoferrum in dessertspoonful doses, three times a day; also take a tablet containing one grain each of valerianate of iron, quinine and zinc every three hours.

If after building up your general health, the discharge does not stop, go to some physician for an examination and treatment.

SORE NAVEL.—My ten-months-old baby has a sore navel, which bleeds at times. There is a red, pointed protrusion about one-third of an inch long, and the navel seems to discharge a white substance. Please tell me cause and treatment?

MRS. M. N., Mineral Wells, Va.

A.—This condition is usually caused by friction and pressure of dressings of cord, the cord should be simply wrapped up in clean absorbent cotton. Would suggest touching the protrusion with Nitrate of Silver stick, then dusting on a little calomel or compound alum powder. Several treatments should entirely relieve.

BABY'S APPETITE.—My two-year-old baby does not eat very well, but will take milk from bottle. He will eat sand if not watched. Is there anything I can do to make him eat? MRS. P. K., San Antonio, Tex.

A.—This morbid appetite that you describe is not normal, and I would suggest that you put your baby on tincture of Chloride of Iron, two drops, three times a day in simple syrup. Would teach him to drink out of glass and not bottle.

With a little patience and persistence you will soon get him to eat the simple foods he ought to have.

FEEDING BABY.—Will you tell me what I should feed baby after weaning her, how often, and should I feed during the night? MRS. B. M., N., Vaughn, N. Mex.

A.—Feed baby every three hours during day, no night feeding, but arrange your feeding so that one will come at bedtime, and on getting up in the morning. Her diet should be largely milk, but you can give cooked cereals, custards, toasted stale wheat bread, graham crackers; later on, baked potato, and coddled eggs.

years of age, five feet, six inches tall, have light hair, big blue eyes and weigh 115 pounds. My birthday comes on the 24th of December. I am in the tenth grade at the Princeton High school.

Will some of the sisters tell me how to make dill pickles that will keep through the winter? We dill ours but have to use them immediately lest they spoil.

If this is in print I'll come again.

AGNES KRYSZTOFIAK.

Agnes.—I should say you were worthy of being a sister. Next time I "do" my pillow I'll try your way. If you wrap the ends of the barrel hoops with cotton batting before covering them you will be better pleased, I think. The padding holds the garment in shape and can be spread with a thin layer of your favorite sachet powder.—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader and subscriber of COMFORT for only two years but I certainly enjoy it.

In regard to children, we have a dear little girl which we adopted at the age of one year, and we feel proud of her. She is three years and seven months old now. Her eyes and hair are dark brown. I think to adopt children is one of the grandest things a childless couple can do. I am sending a picture of our darling Maxine Phyllis and hope to see it in COMFORT.

MRS. F. J. SASSE.

Mrs. Sasse.—I've always wondered what little Red Riding Hood looked like and now I know,—just like your little Maxine Phyllis.—Ed.

WAYNE CITY, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I will stay just long enough to tell you how I like to read your letters, also Mrs. Wilkinson's chats. I think our paper is fine and the recipes particularly good.

EARL AND JAMES DALE ALLEN.

I am enclosing a picture of my two boys. The oldest is fourteen years old, his name is Earl, and the baby, seventeen months old, is named James Dale, and, of course we are very proud of both and hope to make good men of them.

MRS. HENRY ALLEN.

Little James isn't taking any chances of having anything exciting happen to him, such as falling off the table he is seated upon, for his big brother holds him securely. Mrs. Allen, you have every reason to be proud of your boys and we know they will be good men.—Ed.

GREYBULL, WYO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

If it is all right with the rest of you I will sit by Pearl Vesey and Nelle Fischer. I'd like to meet them. To my way of thinking, they are regular scouts. I always look for their letters.

Greybull is in the Big Horn Basin, surrounded by mountains. To the north and east are the Big Horn Mountains and south and west a range of the Rockies. Greybull is an oil town. We did have two large oil refineries here but it is run by one concern now. A refining town is rather interesting to one who has never seen one, but like all other things it becomes common when seen every day. It is an ideal country for outings though. Almost every Sunday we go to the mountains; sometimes we carry our camp bed with us and stay over night. We have a car. A year ago another family and ourselves, husband, my seven-year-old and I, took a camping trip up to Cody, Buffalo Bill's old home. We also drove through Shoshone Canyon and up to Shoshonie dam. It was wonderful up there. The dam is 328 feet high, 108 feet at base, 10 feet wide at top, length of crest 200 feet, capacity of reservoir 456,000 acre feet, area of water surface 10 square miles, length of reservoir 10 miles, maximum width four miles, maximum depth 233 feet, length of spill way 300 feet. The work on this dam was begun in November, 1905 and was completed January, 1910 and cost $1,354,000. They say the scenery in this canyon is every bit as good as Yellowstone Park. At Cody we went through the Irma Hotel, built by Buffalo Bill and named for his daughter. The walls inside are nearly covered with pictures of Buffalo Bill and his different experiences. We also saw his Indian guide whom he educated. He, Red Wolf, was staying a vaudeville here the night before Buffalo Bill's widow died. At the Cody Museum we saw a monument of Buffalo Bill and his horse, called "Waiting for the return of his master from the happy hunting ground."

MAXINE PHYLLIS SASSE.

I have what I call a Wyoming Album, just snapshots taken in Wyoming.

We are tailors by trade and have had a shop here for three years but will leave before long. It is getting the best of us and it doesn't pay to ruin one's health for the few dollars in it. I do all my own work and usually put in eight or nine hours in the shop too, and still I have time to call my own. Last year while I rested for a few minutes, evenings, I crocheted up over two hundred spools of crochet cotton. I have tablecloths, luncheon sets and crocheting on about everything that I own. I also put up 300 quarts of fruits and vegetables. I did this evenings and on Sundays. I couldn't afford to hire it done and people must eat. It wasn't all play either. I also sewed carpet rags and have enough for two nice rugs.

Someone said to start the ball rolling as to the making of inexpensive Christmas gifts. I suggest the following: Take half-a-dozen of your favorite snapshots of interesting scenery and color with oil paints and see how much they are appreciated.

A spool of crochet cotton and a bunch of coronation cord will make several sets of napkin rings. Cut forty-five ribs and with white crochet three single in each "slim" part, make five rows, widening at ends so it will round nicely. Use a pretty color for two rows then use white again, at end, chain six and miss six singles and finish. This makes a buttonhole. Crochet another row and tie your thread. Now cover a pearl button with single crochet and you have a neat napkin ring.

I take scraps of linen and make lemonade-and-water sets, small doilies, etc. Last year I took yard squares of unbleached muslin and outlined teapot, sugar bowl and cups and saucers in each corner and had a neat luncheon cloth. Scraps of linen make very nice napkin cases and cases for knives, forks, etc. Odds and ends of ribbon make very pretty garters when gathered on elastic with a few ribbon rosebuds attached to them.

We are moving away from here next week so I won't leave any address as I don't want mail forwarded.

Wishing all the best of luck,

A WYOMING SISTER.

MOBILE, 14 N. LAWRENCE ST., ALA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been an ardent reader of COMFORT since a small girl and enjoy every part of COMFORT but always read the sisters' letters first.

I would like to have a postcard shower and will answer all I can.

I have been reading Mrs. Gage's letter in regard to making Christmas presents and I have a few ideas which may be of use to some of the readers. A sixteen by-sixteen inch piece of gingham, stiffened with crinoline. Make five pockets of various sizes, each seamed down the center, designed for spoons, can opener, etc., and can be hung on the kitchen wall. One can give a homemade Recipe Book. Make a folder of heavy paper, choosing any color and size you wish. Use your favorite recipes and tie the pages into folder with ribbon. An inscription may be written on the cover, such as "Recipes from an Alabama Cupboard."

Best wishes to all.

EVA E. DAVIDSON.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my third letter and I hope it won't find its way to the waste-basket as my others did, if for no other reason than to convince friend hubby that the sisters actually write and send the letters that are printed.

All the sisters are interested in home problems and ideas. I have made a good bedroom set. The spread is of cheap checked gingham. In the center I appliqued a basket of white material and filled it with colored flowers, appliqued, too. If the spread is to hang over the side of the bed, edge it with a border or ruffle of the white material. I made two scarfs and two squares to match and one pair of curtains. It took thirteen yards of material for which I paid 12 cents a yard. The flowers and basket I made from the scraps of goods I had in the house. I have shown it to my friends and they have decided to make one like it. It launders well, too.

Here is another idea. When your husband's shirts wear at the cuffs and at the neck, cut the sleeves to the elbow of your arm, cut square of V-shaped neck. Take plain colored gingham or chambray to match some color in the shirt, make a skirt of this and attach it to the shirt, add belt and collar and you have a very pretty house dress.

Here is a helpful thing where there are several children. Make a bag of oilcloth with compartments. Hang on back porch and have the children put their overshoes and rubbers in it when they come in from school. Make it with the oilcloth part inside and holes in each corner to let water out.

How many of you have read about McMonnie's new statue, "Civic Virtue," recently placed in the City Hall Park of New York City? It is a man treading on mermaids, the mermaids representing different vices.

Can anyone tell me where Uncle Charlie used to live in Brooklyn?

Edna Stockinger, you opened my heart when you spoke of snapshots. Will you exchange some with me?

I am twenty-six years old, blonde, weigh 128 pounds and have a little girl named Alice. She is in the highest second grade and not yet seven years old.

COMFORT has been a comfort in our home for about twenty years.

My address is with Mrs. Wilkinson.

Love to all.

MICKEY REYNOLDS.

Mickey.—Speaking of gingham, I saw some of the dearest "undies" recently, made of fine white material trimmed with checked gingham in pastel colorings. Very good looking. Thanks for snapshot of yourself.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I would appreciate the privilege of contributing my bit of hints in regard to Christmas presents and home helps, as I have always received so much help from the other sisters.

Being poor in purse I make all my Christmas presents. Among the woodpile (we buy mill ends) I find old pieces of wood, one piece in the shape of a diamond, another a crescent. Sandpaper, then paint or varnish these; let first coat of paint or varnish dry thoroughly. Get finishing nails, and nail these to painted pieces wide enough apart to hold spools of thread. Have one end nail driven in further to hold thimble and the other end nail covered with a small pincushion and you have a handy thread, thimble and needle holder. I paint sprays of flowers on these holders. Oil paints are best for this purpose.

I make tabarets, smoking set stands (just the stands), magazine wall racks and various other things from pieces one-half inch square, length of magazine, width to suit individual taste. These racks are useful in kitchen as tin lid holders when solid plank is used for bottom of rack. Footstools are easy and always useful. I make them from three inches to one foot in

A year later he was dead. He died suddenly, after struggling hard with business troubles, and his family had been left in very reduced circumstances.

Through Ralph Meredith Star caused a handsome sum to be invested, the income of which they were to enjoy while they should live, and she never saw or heard from them again.

* * * * *

St. George's Church, Hanover Square, was crowded upon Star Gladstone's bridal morning.

The bridal wreath was of delicate, feathery clematis, and was fastened to her head and veil with a set of five beautiful diamond stars, the gift of Jacob Rosevelt.

They were to spend a couple of months at Carrolton, Lord Carrol's country seat, whither upholsterers and decorators had been sent, as soon as the wedding had been decided upon, to make everything fresh and attractive for them.

Of course Mrs. Blunt was indispensable at this time, and she was made as happy as it is possible for a mortal to be in this life by Star's assurance that she should be a fixture in her household as long as she should live.

After the two months at Carrolton they were to go to Halowell Park for a season, and take a look at the home of the Thorntons.

Theirs was to be no stereotyped tour. Star said she had traveled enough for the present, and would much prefer to settle down to quiet home life—perhaps by another year they might feel like making a trip to the Continent.

Lady Sherbrooke had already grown to love her new daughter very dearly.

"It is well that I do love her," she said, tearfully, to Vivien, when the grand wedding was over, the guests all gone, and they were left by themselves, "if I must lose you, as I expect, before very long; but if I had searched the world over I could not have found a fairer, sweeter wife for my son. Heaven bless our Star! She bids fair to prove a guiding light in Archie's home."

* * * * *

Jacob Rosevelt lay upon a luxurious couch in an elegant apartment of Lady Star Carrol's beautiful home, and looking his last upon earth.

Everything that wealth, and love, and care could do had been done for the dear old man whom she loved so fondly; but now, after three years of such peace and content as once he had never thought to enjoy, he was dying.

Star had grown a trifle matronly in her appearance, and there is something more of dignity in her bearing; but she is not one whit less lovely or less deserving of her name than when we last saw her on her bridal morn.

A year of almost unalloyed happiness passed after that event, and then there was born a fine heir to the Carrol estate—a boy, of whom his father was very proud, and who at once became the pet and pride of the whole household.

Uncle Jacob, with this little one folded within his arms, or sitting crowing upon his knee, with Star fondly attentive to his every want, and Lord Carrol to lean upon in his old age, felt as if he had attained as nearly to perfect happiness as anyone could do in this world.

But during the third year after their marriage he had gradually but surely failed, until, to the great grief of all, they were obliged to acknowledge that he had not long to live.

This was the first great sorrow of Star's wedded life; but she strove to bear it cheerfully, at least in Mr. Rosevelt's presence, resolving that no mourning or repining should cloud the little time that remained to him to live—that there should be nothing but peace, and a looking forward to the great change as simply the sweeping aside of a misty veil and an entrance into something more blessed and beautiful than earth could give.

It was a hallowed room where Star sat, a little later, and gazed upon her dead—upon that brow which had settled into such tranquility—upon that restful, upturned face, which wore a smile "calm as a twilight lake."

And when they laid him away in the family vault at Halowell, where, too, lay the moldering form of her whom he had so loved in the days of his earlier manhood, she did not murmur, for she felt that he had left behind him a wealth of faith, and love, and trust that would glorify all her own after-life, and through the years that came and went in her beautiful home, she carried the memory and influences of Jacob Rosevelt's life, and it seemed like a strain of heavenly music, making her life rich with melody. It was like a breath from the flowers of Paradise, perfuming all around her.

Her husband worshiped her—reverently, as a gift from the Divine Hand, while all who knew her likened the influence of her lovely example, the luster and beauty of her life, to the "transit" of some bright "star."

height. I paint bright colored butterflies and flowers on black paper, with water colors, and make into picture books for children.

Each month I try (and most always do) to send something to two shutins, choosing different ones each month. I love to do this and would send to more but am not able. Some months it is pretty cards or shells; clothes another month.

When I "come across" any scraps of cloth or something I can make into a garment or toy, I put it into a box, saved for this purpose, to be used for Christmas gifts. I have a little collection saved to send to the Orphanage. I don't miss the odd moments devoted to this, and what if I did when it is to make someone happier?

If COMFORT were a woman she would be the dearest old-fasioned, sympathetic, motherly soul. That is why we all love "her" so. We can write her all our troubles and pleasures and she is so patient, scolds very seldom.

I have one of the best husbands and he thinks I am a wonderfully sweet girl. Don't know what my neighbors think of me.

I have lived on a farm for seven years and am crazy about it, though born and raised in a large city. I am sorry to say I am not on a farm now, but am

A CONTENTED WIFE.

Contented Wife.—If your neighbors are people of discernment they will agree with your husband. What a lovely way to think of COMFORT. I am sure "she" appreciates it.—Ed.

SUMMERFIELD, ILL.

DEAR MRS. W. AND SISTERS:

Well, Mrs. W. has kept me outside for nearly two years and now don't you think I am entitled to a seat in your happy circle? I am a little girl, I say "little" because I am, between sixteen and twenty years of age. Have dark brown hair, blue eyes and a fair complexion. Am five feet, four inches tall and weigh 131 pounds.

Here are some ideas I will pass on to others. Sisters, did you ever make luncheon sets of linene and cretonne? There are several ways to arrange the patterns but one of the prettiest is to make a large square of the cretonne and around it attach the linene. The napkins are made of a square of the plain goods with small corners of cretonne sewed on. Another good way is to make a narrow edge around cloth and napkins of cretonne. Painted oilcloth luncheon sets are beautiful and save much work. The design is stamped with a perforated pattern and colored enamelac is used, or the artist can mix her own colors, as I did, by taking plain white enamel and mixing it with tube paints, but be careful that the cloth and paints are of the same temperature or the paint will crack off. If the enamelac is too thick, thin with turpentine but use banana oil to thin that which is mixed with tube paint. Unbleached muslin aprons trimmed with cretonne are very pretty; also stitched with colored thread with a design of cups and saucers, and edged with bias tape to match thread used.

In the matter of dining-room sets, I made a buffet scarf with crocheted corners of grape design. With this I made twelve napkins with smaller design in corners, and a large luncheon cloth with grape design crocheted in center. These were finished with picot edge.

I hope this will help some girl fill her hope box.

Your COMFORT Sister. MISS WAHL.

Miss Wahl.—Somehow or other, your name got torn off your letter so I had to call you Miss but from your knowledge of hope box things I have a suspicion that it won't be "Miss" much longer.—Ed.

CHIMACUM, WASH.

HELLO:

(Regular Western salutation!) Who remembers me? While I am holding the door ajar you will get a cool breeze from the Pacific. It is about two years since I was with you and I have received many nice letters from the sisters since then.

I wish Nelle Fischer would write again. I hope she hasn't run away with Bachelor Bill.

Sisters, do you know that splendid jelly can be made from strawberries that are not too ripe? I made many glasses of it from the surplus juice after filling my jars with the fruit. Add a little sugar to juice and boil it a few minutes.

I will tell you how I line patty pans or gem pans for tarts. Roll out pie crust just as for cookies and cut out with a quart size tomato can, or any can of that size. By pressing around edges of crust after it is in the patty pan, you will find it just reaches the top. Use a cooky cutter for top crust if you are making them double. Always wet the edges of the under pie crust before covering with top crust.

I see that Mrs. Wilkinson wishes us to send suggestions for Christmas gifts. My favorite article is a bag. There is such a variety of ways to make them that one could make twenty and have no two alike, a piece bag for the housewife, fancy bag for the girl, laundry bag for the boy, wrist bag for the woman who crochets and handkerchief bag for Bachelor Bill. In fact, what kind of person would not appreciate and find use for a neatly made bag? Scraps left from sewing, with a little cretonne for trimming, and a touch of crochet or blanket stitch and you soon have a sensible gift made.

I like Mrs. Marsh's letters about California for although I have seen a good portion of that state I haven't had time while there for exploration.

The letter of Mrs. Eva Shinn in July COMFORT on the subject of economy was fine.

Now to the sister who writes "Maggie Robinson, what do you do when your duties pile up so you cannot tell which is nearest?" To her I will say, look in the dictionary and you will see the word duty defined as "Something we should do," not "something we are expected to do." Now sort out your pile and see if many of the tasks you have been looking upon as duties are not just things you are expected to do. I think you will find that a woman's duties never exceed her physical and mental ability. So I repeat my philosophy, "Do the duty that lies nearest you; after that do your best and leave the rest." My theory is that a woman's first duty is to her children, next to her husband. Here is my reason. The children are dependent upon us, we brought them here and must take care of them. Friend Husband got along very well before he ever saw us.

Hoping I have not overstayed my welcome, I will say good by. MRS. MAGGIE ROBINSON.

Mrs. Robinson.—I can vouch for the fact that Nelle hasn't run away with Bachelor Bill, and here's a secret—I expect to visit her soon and perhaps I'll tell you all about it.—Ed.

ANAMOOSE, R. R. 1, BOX 7, N. DAK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I was married six years ago to a good man. I was only seventeen and knew but very little about managing a house. We were married a year when our boy was born. A neighbor told me about COMFORT and I subscribed for it for three years. Our baby was sickly and I had to put him on the bottle. Then good old COMFORT came handy. He is five years old now and well and strong. We have two more children, a boy of three and a baby girl of one and one-half years. Husband is very kind to the children and to me but very strict. He thinks the world of the children and plays with them like a small boy. They often make me weary with their noise but Daddy always says, "They are only kids; they'll be gone too soon and then we'll wish we had them small and at home again."

COMFORT taught me many tricks with flour sacks. It is wonderful the different ways they can be used. I am making a set for baby's crib. I stamp all the animals I can find on nine-inch squares of flour sacking and sew cretonne strips between. Both sides are alike. Outline the animals with floss, blue on one side and pink on the other. To quilt I stitch around the squares by machine. Tie with blue and pink yarn. These quilts are thin and light for summer and easy to wash. The curtain around the bottom of her crib has animals appliqued on it. With a crocheted edge around spread and pillow case, baby has a neat and inexpensive bed.

I find that grain sacks are good for overalls when dyed.

Here is one of my ideas for a cook book. Get two rings such as are used for a loose leaf book, and put through several sheets of drawing paper. Make covers of pasteboard and decorate with picture of a negro mammy cook or some picture taken from magazine. Paste recipes in rotation and use first page for index. These books are very handy and if something doesn't suit, that page is easily removed without damaging the book.

One more thing, about paint. Our boys were out playing and found an old pail with enough paint left in it to smear clothes and plaster their heads well. I took vinegar and kerosene mixed and washed the paint out of their hair and greased it well with lard. Do not use too much kerosene on scalp. Next morning I washed their hair with soft water as hot as they could stand it. Then Daisy clipped their hair close to the head. A person always finds some new experience to face.

I am five feet, four inches tall. Have coffee brown hair, curly. My eyes are brown and I weigh 130 pounds. I love music and my piano is half my life. I would like to hear from any COMFORT sister who will write to me.

With best wishes to the Corner,

MRS. ROBERT LEDER.

GOTHAM, WISC.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I won't take time and space to tell you how much we all like COMFORT, but this much will explain. We have had it in our home for over sixteen years.

"Red," I enjoyed your letter and would like to visit you as I am always in for a good time and know by your letter that you always find the funny side. You certainly found some uses for sacks and I am sure you have helped many others besides me.

I must tell you about a luncheon cloth I have finished. I made mine from unbleached muslin but it would be pretty made from sacks. In each corner I appliqued a blue teapot of gingham, it is outlined with blue embroidery silk and the knot is embroidered solid. The steam is outlined in black. I used a long and short stitch to hold hem. It is really very pretty and almost anyone can draw a teapot for a pattern. Smaller ones could be drawn and appliqued on napkins. Any color could be used but the blue appealed to me. It doesn't take long to make a set like this and it would be a most acceptable Christmas present.

Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and COMFORT sisters.

LAUGHING WATERS.

GOBLE, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am writing a letter to your happy corner, hoping to help those who haven't money to buy Christmas gifts for their friends. I look to COMFORT's helpful pages for ideas for gifts and to the scrap bag for material.

For Minima I made a dainty handkerchief box from a small pasteboard box. Cover it with cretonne and if your mother is fond of poems or pictures paste a favorite poem or picture inside the cover. I put in some handkerchiefs made from salt sacks. I made a collar from a piece of plain net and after it was finished I worked a design into the net with blue and white floss. I made baby brother a Dinah doll from an old silk stocking. He had lots of fun with it. After putting wheels and handle on a cigar box he had a good little wagon. I made a sweater and cap to match from one of big brother's old ones. From two old caps, home knitted, I got enough yarn to make a pair of wristers and a scarf to go around Daddy's neck. With two or three premiums from COMFORT I had enough gifts to show them they were not forgotten.

I use all kinds of sacks for various things.

I am five feet, seven inches tall, have brown hair, blue eyes and a light complexion and am fifteen years old.

E. G. DAHL.

MILLTOWN, IND.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Here comes a brown-eyed girl from Indiana's hills, and I love every hill in dear old Indiana, too.

It's time to commence the Christmas gifts, and one of the most useful is a towel. I have made one of white linen with a ribbon bow, wreath and initial embroidered on it in solid and eyelit stitch, hemstitching it at both ends.

Wooden coat hangers can be covered with satin ribbon. It should be gathered on, using ribbon same shade to cover hook.

Camisoles made of white satin and embroidered in dainty colors will please any girl or young woman.

Aprons are always appreciated.

Pillow slips can be used in any home and are not expensive gifts, and can be trimmed with lace or embroidered.

The home-made gift has a personal touch that the gift bought in store does not possess.

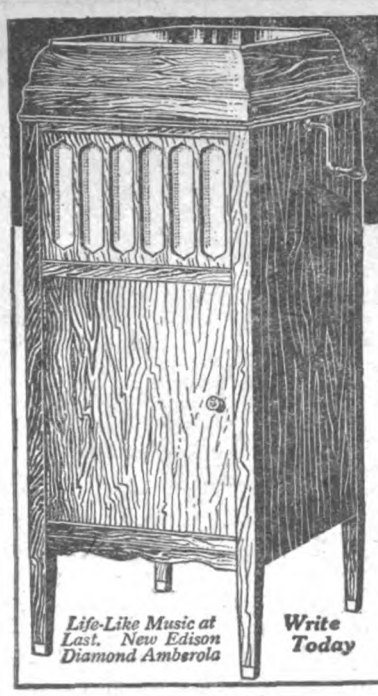
I would be glad to hear from some of the readers. I am twenty-two years old and am tanned a dark brown. The sun is no respecter of persons, especially when we go bareheaded.

Love to all the sisters. REA M. ROTHROCK.

MONTANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am making my Christmas gifts now and when Christmas is here I will not be rushed. I will tell you of some of the gifts and how I made them.



I buy stamped dresser scarfs at sales and instead of using them as bought I cut them into two pieces and make night gown cases. Bind the cut end, fold this up to the edge of the embroidery on the wrong side and bind the sides; then when you have finished the embroidery, turn this end down over the pocket as a flap and either fasten with a snap or arrange a ribbon to tie. These cases are pretty and convenient.

Clothes hangers of ribbon and safety pins are convenient, taking but little space in traveling. Each hanger requires about six inches of inch-wide ribbon; tie a loose knot in the middle, bring the ends evenly together and carefully fold around the upper part of bar of a good-sized safety pin, sewing as you would a

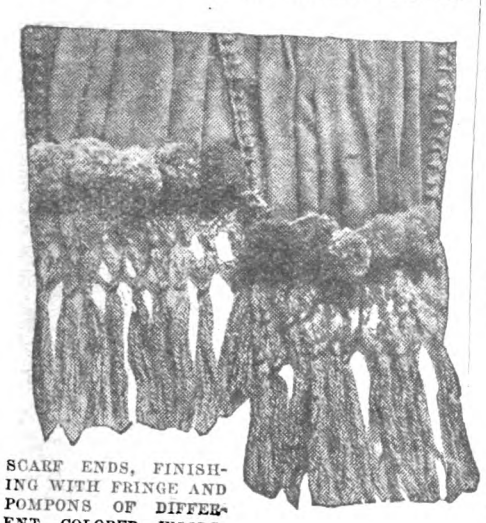
Gifts One Girl Can Make For Another

Soft Flower Trimmed Hat

AMONG the things that claim first attention this season in the way of accessories are scarfs or sport sets of scarf and cap of either silk, wool or fabric.

For gifts, nothing will give more pleasure as no suit is considered complete without one, therefore every girl and woman must have a scarf for warmth or, what is more important, for style.

From an ever increasing and bewildering number of beautiful models we have selected a few which embody good ideas for home-made sets which will meet different needs and tastes.



Knitted or crocheted sets of wool are, perhaps, most desirable and popular. Scarfs are seen in these styles from drop-stitch silk to open-work Iceland.

Homespuns, tweeds and wool Jersey lead in the fabrics, darned and embroidered to secure colorful contrasts.

A very chic set for a young girl is our first model, which features the new wool pompon decorations.

Hat. No. 2.—Two balls silk mixture or Angora for hat, in blue, tan, white or any other preferred light shade. Small ball each of old blue, rose, lavender, green, yellow and black for flowers. No. 2 steel hook, one yard heavy hat wire.

Using wool for hat, ch 2, 5 s c in 1st st of ch, 1 s c of 1st single, 2 s c on next, repeat. Work round and round, increasing enough to keep work flat until circle measures six inches across; now increase every 15th st for 1 rd, 2 rds without increasing, increase every 20th st 1 rd, 2 rds without increasing. Next rd increase in every 25th st. Work about five inches without increasing.

SCARF ENDS, FINISHING WITH FRINGE AND POMPONS OF DIFFERENT COLORED WOOLS.

Brim

Increase every other stitch, work two and one-half inches, increasing only as necessary to make work about flat, not at all full. Overcast wire with wool to edge, overlapping ends about three inches. Work over wire one row of singles.

Flowers

Roses are made of the rose and lavender wool as follows: Ch 3, join, ch 3, 1 s c in ring, ch 2, 1 s c, repeat twice, ch 2, join, 1 s c in 4 sps, join, ch 5, 1 s c under s c, ch 1, 5 d c, 1 s c in 1 sp, 1 s c, 5 d c, in center round, carry ch back of last round. Repeat four times. Join. Now work 1 s c, 2 d c, ch 1, 3 treble, ch 1, 2 d c, ch 1, 3 tr c, ch 1, 2 d c, 1 s c under ch 5. With yellow, ch 5, 3 d c in 3rd ch, 1 s c, cut wool, draw up tightly to form ball. Make five for center of each rose.

Bluebell

With old blue ch 4, join, 6 s c in ring, 12 s c on 6 s c under both loops, work without increasing until little bell measures about one inch, increase twice in a round two more rounds, increase four times, continue to enlarge so the edge will allow of rolling back, edge with one round of light blue.

Make yellow centers same as for roses but with longer chains. The bells may be of different sizes.

Leaves

With green ch 10, 1 s c in 9th st, 3 d c in 3 sts, 1 tr c, 3 d c, 1 s c, ch 5.

These may be varied in size and also worked on both sides of center ch for larger leaves.

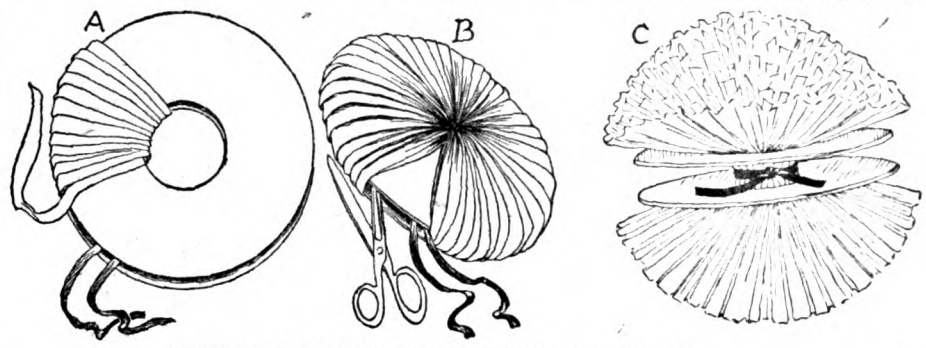
Pompon Scarf and Tam

This set is attractive and novel as it is becoming. Grey Shetland and yellow brush wool was the combination, used in the original. Using No. 5 bone needles, cast on 7 sts, knit 1 row.

2nd row—K 1st, increase by knitting back of same st. Repeat.

3rd row—K each st. Repeat these two rows twice.

8th row—K 2 sts, increase 1 st. Repeat.



9th row—K each st.

10th row—K 4 sts, increase 1 st. Repeat. K 1 row.

12th row—K 3 sts, increase 1 st. Repeat. K 3 rows.

16th row—K 8 sts, increase 1 st. Repeat. One row plain. K 9 sts, increase 1 st. One row plain. Continue working in this manner until knitting measures about six inches. K plain for three inches without increasing. K 2 sts together. K 1. Repeat around. Next row, K 2 sts together. Bind off loosely. Try for head size. If too large, repeat last row; if too small, take out last row. With head size right, K six rows plain, bind off loosely.

The scarf is of plain knitting 60 stitches wide, five feet long. Sixty small pompons are placed hit and miss on the scarf ends and 30 on the tam. To make these, cut two and one-half inch cardboard circles, in centers cut holes size of one's little finger. Cut off several yards of wool, double into four strands, hold circles closely together and wind. (See Fig. A.) When center is filled, slip scissors edge. (See Fig. B.) Tie a strong piece of twine around between the forms (See Fig. C), pull these off, clip ends and brush up into fluffy balls with a teazle brush which comes special for this purpose, or use just nicely trimmed.

METHOD OF MAKING BALLS OR POMPONS OF WOOL.

CARD TABLE COVER.
For directions see Page 28.

For this set one will require four balls of grey and one yellow wool.

Angora Wool Embroidery

The set shown in No. 4 is so soft and pretty and so warm without weight or heaviness, it is especially suited for the chilliest weather.

For this, dull tan, jade green or grey Jersey is most attractive combined with white angora. For the scarf and hat one will need two yards of material and at least four balls of angora. The grape clusters may be placed hit-and-miss on the scarf ends or arranged as a border.

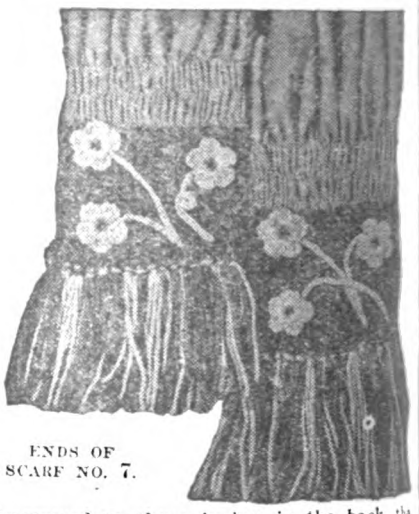
Fiber silk forms the knotted-in fringe and buttonholed edges of the hat.

All designs for Angora embroidery should be simple in character, for the delicate softness of the wool will not stand constant pulling back and forth through the material. A short needleful only should be taken as it is liable to break.

The grapes should be thickly padded with any white wool and then worked over and over in satin stitch.

The leaves are outlined, long stitches being taken to make a good clear line. The scarf measures 14x64 inches.

The hat is made up with only an inner lining of cotton flannel so it is very soft.



The crown is an oval, measuring seven and one-half by eight inches, made of six pieces. To this join a band on the straight, four and one-half by 22 inches.

The brim is a bias, four and one-half by 27 inches. Embroider it with separate motifs arranged to suit, and finish the edges with buttonholing.

No. 6 pictures one of the soft, becoming tam-o'-shanter hats which can be made of any woolen material to match a suit or scarf. Cut oval eight by [illegible] and one-half inches. Join to this a bias [illegible] the required length and five and one-half inches wide.

Decorate with roses embroidered in long-and-short buttonhole stitch, using either silk or wool or cut rose and leaves from silk or velvet of a contrasting shade and work over the raw edges by buttonholing. When completed, sew lower edge of bias to a [illegible] band the right head size and finish with a [illegible] lining.

No. 3—Roll-back sport hat. This is made in the same manner, excepting the bias band is narrowed to three inches in the back, the greatest width being in center of front, where a conventional design is worked out in straight cross lines. These can be in any gay colored silk, wool or chenille.

ENDS OF SCARF NO. 7.

Hat No. 8 has a crown of Alice blue silk mixture, brim and rose spray of white angora. One ball blue, two angora and one yard hat wire will be required. Using medium size hook, ch 2, 5 s c into 1st st. Work round and round, increasing just enough to keep work flat as directed for hat No. 2. When six-inch circle is completed, increase by working 2 s c in every 15th st for 1 rd, 2 rds without increasing, 1 rd increase every 20th st, 2 rds plain, 1 rd increase every 25th st, now work three inches without increasing.

Brim

With Angora, 2 s c in each 1st 2 sts, 1 s c in 3rd st, repeat around. Work round and round, increasing as necessary to make brim lie flat for three inches. Holding wire to edge of last row, work 2 s c in each st, lap ends of wire three inches to hold firm.

Rose

With Angora, ch 3, join, ch 7, 1 d c into ring, ch 5, 1 d c, repeat, join last ch to 3rd st, ch 7, thus making five spaces in all.

2nd row—1 s c, 2 d c, 1 tr c, 2 d c, 1 s c in each sp.

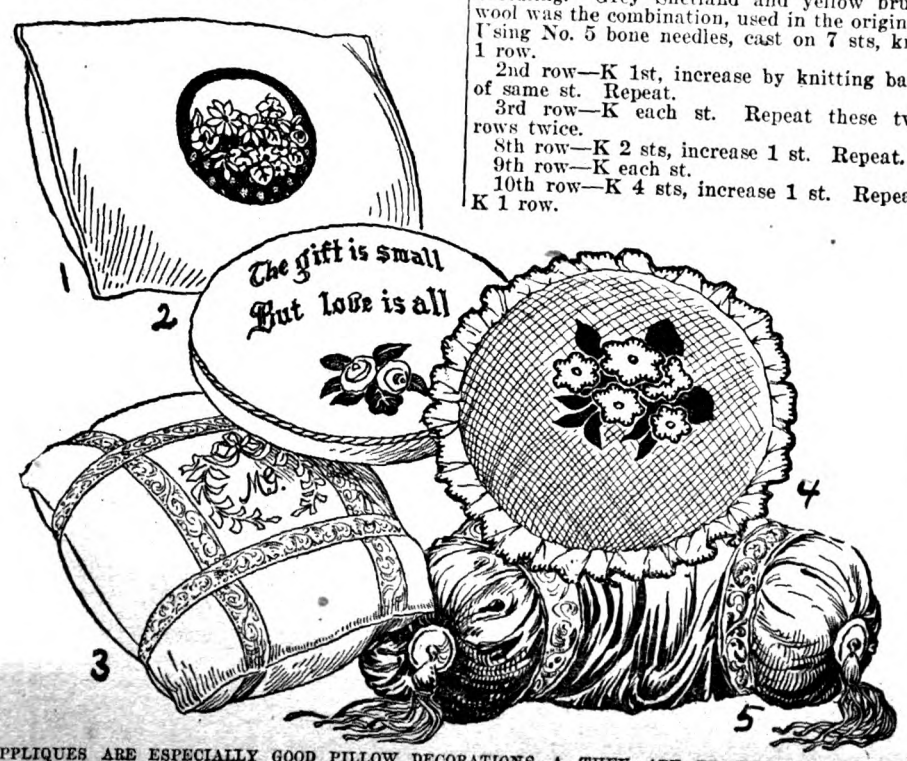
4th row—1 s c, 3 d c, 2 tr c, 3 d c, 1 s c, under each ch 6.

5th row—Same as 3rd, making chs 7.

6th row—1 s c, 2 d c, 6 tr c, 2 d c, 1 s c, under each ch 7.

7th row—Ch 8 behind petals.



8th row—1 s c, 2 d c, 8 tr c, 2 d c, 1 s c, under each ch 8.

Ch 10, skip 1, 1 s c, 2 d c, 3 tr c, 2 d c, 1 s c in 9 sts, turn, 1 s c in base of single, doubles and trebles in base of stitches on first side. Make group of three leaves, five and one-half inch ch, two more leaves opposite each other, two-inch ch. Sew spray to left side of crown.

Wool Embroidered Set

At the right is pictured a good-looking tam and scarf which will add much to any dark street suit. It is of beaver color, livened with peacock blue chenille and brown and copper

Some Things That Can Be Made For Him

MEN'S CROCHETED TIES.

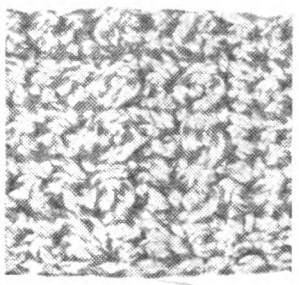
CROCHETED BOW TIE.

New Crocheted Men's Ties

Some men much prefer a hand-made or woven silk tie, while others are not partial to this style of neckwear, so before putting in the necessary time and effort it is best to have an idea as to whether one's handiwork will be appreciated.

Hand-made ties to be presentable must be well made, but aside from this the work is simple.

The puff stitches used in these patterns are all made as follows:



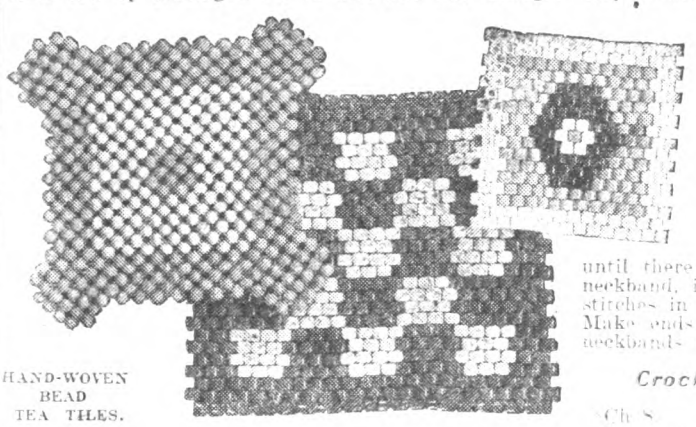
Draw loop through bottom of s c in previous row, silk over hook, loop drawn through same stitch again, silk over hook and draw through four loops on needle. For each tie one spool of tie silk and No. 7 steel hook will be needed.

Design No. 1

Ch 22 sts, turn.

1st row—21 s c, ch 1, turn.

2nd row—9 s c working through both loops of each, 1 puff working through 10th st of 1st ch, ch 1, 1 s c, 1 puff through 12th st, ch 1, 9 s c, ch 1, turn.



DETAIL OF TIE FOR NO. 1.

3rd row—9 s c, 1 puff in top 10th st of 1st row, ch 1, 1 s c, 1 puff in 12th st, ch 1, 9 s c, ch 1, turn.

4th row—9 s c, draw loop through puff in previous row, draw loop through two loops on hook, ch 1, 1 s c, work over next puff in same way, ch 1, 9 s c, ch 1, turn.

Repeat last two rows for 14 inches. Decrease each end by skipping second stitch in every other row (always work first and last stitches until nine stitches remain). Make neck-band. Increase one stitch each and every other row by making 2 s c in first and last stitches. Increase to 19 sts, make 6 s c, 1 puff, ch 1, 1 s c, 1 puff, ch 1, 6 s c for 12 inches or more. Leave long thread, with needle overcast through every stitch, make cord on end, fasten securely.

HAND-WOVEN BEAD TEA TILES.

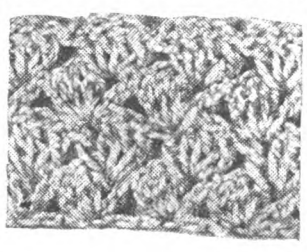
Ch 21 stitches, turn.



1st row—In 3rd st make 3 d c, ch 1, 1 d c in same st. Repeat, 7 shells should be in each row, ch 3, turn.

2nd row—3 d c under ch 1, ch 1, 1 d c in same place. Repeat to end row.

Repeat second row until work is 14 inches. Next two rows narrow one shell at each end, three shells remaining. Make neck-band about 14 inches, increase in two rows to seven shells, make 10 inches.

Design No. 3

This effective pattern is one which can be worked more rapidly. Satin stitch makes the design. One d c, ch 21 sts, turn.

DETAIL OF TIE NO. 2.

1st row—20 s c, ch 1, turn.

2nd row—9 s c, 2 satin sts worked through base of singles completely covers them; 9 s c, ch 1, turn.

3rd row—7 s c, 2 satin sts, 2 s c, 2 satin sts, 7 s c, ch 1, turn.

5th row—5 s c, 2 satin sts, 6 s c, 2 satin sts, 5 s c, ch 1, turn, repeat.

7th row—3 s c, 2 satin sts, 10 s c, 2 satin sts, 3 s c, ch 1, turn, repeat.

2 sts in the center. Make five more rows like 2nd row then repeat from 3rd row for seven to eight inches, decrease by skipping first and next to last st every other row until you have 8 s c, make neck-band.

Increase one stitch each end every other row to 20 stitches. Work design for 10 inches.

in each until only two stitches remain. Tie and cut silk and work from other side to center.

Make up as usual.

Bead Tea Tile

A gift of one of these new tiles for teapot, hot plate or platter is something which will surely be appreciated by a housekeeper. They can be wiped clean with a damp cloth and are as artistic as they are easy to make.

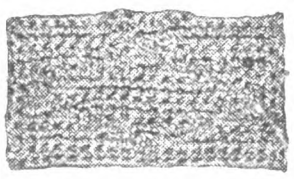
Checker Block Tile

Of blue and white china beads, in size large enough to thread with a fine darning needle, one may copy the largest tile illustrated, which somewhat resembles the famous delftware. Any strong twine or No. 3 white crochet cotton may be used.

Thread needle with two yards, making large knot in end. String 27 blue beads, draw up closely as possible, turn, run through 24th bead. String 1 bead through 22nd bead, string 1 through 20th. Repeat, at end after running through 2nd bead, run through knot, draw down, wind thread around between first and second beads. Straighten two rows, draw up as tightly as possible. Hold closely. The start is hardest as the thread is long but for strong work it is best to avoid joining threads as much as possible.

To turn, always work in this way: string two beads, hold one opposite 1st bead, one opposite 2nd bead, run through 3rd bead, string one, through out standing bead string 1, through one. Repeat. Arrange each row, draw up tightly, string 2, turn.

Make four rows blue beads, turn. Run through blue. Now string 1 white through blue, string 1 white throug blue. Now string blue beads between 2 blue beads, 2 white between 2 blue beads, 2 blue between 2 blue, 2 white between 2 blue, 1 blue through blue, turn as usual. Next row, 1 white through white, 1 white through white, 1 blue through blue, 1 blue through blue, repeat, making blue borders. Two blue blocks and 3 white blocks. Work until one has 3 white beads, 4 white beads, 3 white beads, 4 white beads in each white block and the same in each blue block.



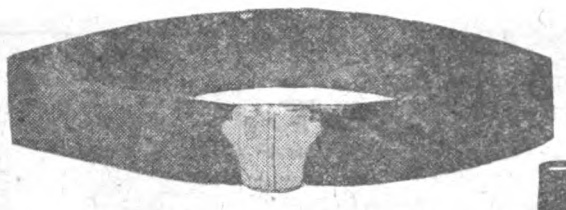
Then reverse, stringing beads so that blue blocks will come opposite white blocks and vice versa. Repeat until five blocks in width are completed and finish with blue border. Knot thread by tying securely and pulling so knot will come in center of a bead, then cut ends. After making one tile one can very easily copy any pattern as all are made in the same manner although they may vary in shape.

The edges of the smallest tile show how every other bead stands out.

Gold Wire Bandeau

Such a band as this is as becoming and attractive as it is useful in holding one's bobbed locks in place at a party or dance.

For it one will require one roll of gold hat wire, one spool each of white, yellow and green crochet silk and a fine steel crochet hook.



DETAIL OF TIE NO. 3.

First make the fish-net wire coronet. The outline of this is of one piece of wire joined at one of the ends. Bend this in shape so that the ends will be an inch in width, the lower wire is straight, the upper bent to make a two and one-half or three-inch point in the front.

After the shape is ready, start with second wire, twist tightly about lower wire, near one end leave two inches of second wire and twist again, repeat to opposite end, making a series of loops; return, twist to center of loops, repeat back and forth, filling in the front with extra rows.

This will give one a fish-net effect. Cover the joining of wires by winding closely with silk.

Decorate with silk roses and leaves on the left side. For each rose one will need seven pieces of taffeta four inches square. Fold to form a triangle, gather edges of triangle and draw up. For center of each rose cover a little ball of cotton batting with silk, winding thread around at bottom to hold securely. Arrange petals around the center, overlapping each other and sew in place. Roses should vary somewhat in size, and two shades of roses are more effective combined with green ribbon leaves.

GENTLEMAN'S CROCHETED SILK BELT.

Embroidered Stockings

Silk stockings are no longer a novelty but a pair of embroidered silk stockings are not to be found in everyone's wardrobe. They make a lovely gift and are among the possibilities if one loves to embroider.

The low, fancy-strapped shoes have made instep decorations as popular as the clocked sides.

Several colors may be combined in working stockings, but they should be in delicate shades. Shun anything bright as the effect will be gaudy but not attractive.

Cross-stitch designs are especially pretty. Solid embroidery should be slightly padded. Black lace inserts in either black or white stockings are especially pretty for evening wear.

As just a touch of embroidery is required to make a pair of stockings somewhat out of the ordinary, any one whose fingers are deft need not hesitate, but though little time is necessary the work must be done carefully so that there will be no pulling.

Sofa Pillows That Are Different

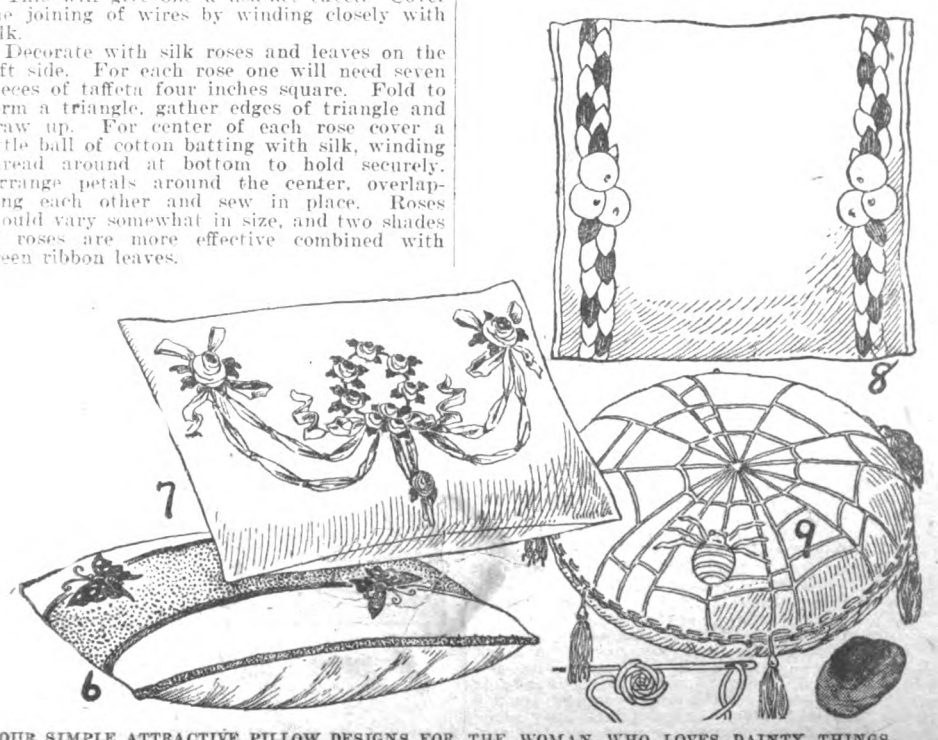
Among the things which always make acceptable gifts may be counted pillows, as one can scarcely have too many.

The simpler covers which are now so popular, practical and serviceable may often be made up of materials on hand. With a little thoughtful planning and the illustration, showing what can be done, one ought to be able to work up some very attractive covers with little cost aside from the time spent in their making.

EMBROIDERED SILK STOCKINGS.

An attractive cover having a basket brimful of flowers appliqued against a plain background of creamy unbleached, is our first suggestion. Only a yard of this material will be needed and the decoration can surely be worked up of such odds and ends as one may have.

The nine-inch circle which is cleverly cut to suggest a basket, is prettier of some finely figured or checked goods, and it should also be rather dark in coloring to form a background for the flowers.



For these use all your vivid bits, fell down neatly, using French knots for the flower centers.

It is quite impossible to reproduce the charm of the small oval pillow, No. 2. The idea is to make a personal appeal by working out a cover which presents one's favorite flower.

Roses on pink satin, violets on pale lavender, or forgetmenots on blue. The size is small, only 11x13 inches, as these are intended for little tuck-in pillows.

For a semi-invalid or elderly person such a gift would give comfort as well as cheer. The words, which are in outline, and the little motif, which may be embroidered with the

My Previous Experiences in Aeronautics

THE amazingly rapid development of aerial navigation from its comparatively recent experimental stage to its present status of practical commercial utility is strikingly manifest in the achievements attained in this field during the thirteen years that have intervened between my first taste of the delights of sky sailing in 1909 by means of a balloon of the old, familiar type, such as has been in common use for nearly a century and a half, and my latest flying experience the past summer in touring six countries of central Europe as a passenger on the great air liners that ply regularly over established routes serving public travel between the larger cities with the comfort and safety of express trains but at much greater speed and affording far more interesting views of the country traversed.

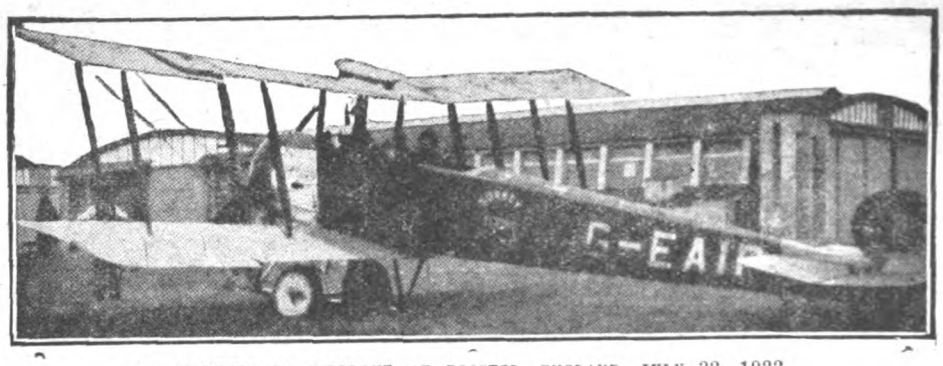
In the account (printed in the November, 1909, issue of COMFORT) of my first balloon ascension I included a description of the three types of air craft which I will briefly summarize here to show their distinctive features and respective attainments at that time. I pointed out: first, that the old-fashioned, gas-inflated balloon was still the popular favorite because of its safety, although there had been little, if any, improvement in its design since 1783, the year in which it was devised and the first ascension made, and despite the fact that it possessed neither automotive nor steerage power, merely drifting at the speed and in the direction that the wind happened to blow, and incapable of control except that it could be made to ascend by throwing out ballast or to descend by letting out gas. It was in such a balloon that, in 1909, I was borne on the wings of the wind from Pittsfield, Mass., to Springfield in the same State. Complete control of aerial locomotion had been accomplished only within the previous year by means of the dirigible balloon and the aeroplane, as I wrote at that time.

The dirigible balloon, a huge, cigar-shaped gas bag with a rigid frame, under-hung platform for support of machinery and accommodation of crew, passengers and cargo, and equipped with rudders for steering and motors and propellers for locomotion, was capable of being driven at considerable speed even against an ordinary wind. The inventive efforts of Count Zeppelin, encouraged and aided by the German government, had produced a dirigible of such enormous size, great power and high efficiency as seemed to promise boundless commercial and most formidable military possibilities; but in both respects the expectations of its sponsors have been disappointed, although for a while it served as an effective instrument of German frightfulness in the World War until its unwieldy force was overmatched by the superior speed and agility of its pigmy antagonists, the airplanes. Its practical value for war purposes or for peaceful pursuits, is still problematical.

To America exclusively is credit due for the invention of the aeroplane or airplane. Prof. Langley of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D. C., discovered, and by his experiments with "gliders" demonstrated the fundamental principles of flying. Then the Wright brothers, by applying these discoveries supplemented by the results of further experiments of their own, devised and constructed in America the first successful flying machine and thereby realized man's centuries-old dream. The airplane truly flies, supported in air only by its wings, like a bird. In 1909 the airplane was a crude experimental device, too dangerous and unreliable for practical utility, but being designed in accordance with the basic principles of flying it only needed improvement of details such as better control, greater power and larger size to render it safe, dependable and serviceable for many and varied uses. To appreciate the extent to which its improvement has since progressed one should bear in mind that the largest airplane in 1909 could carry no more than two people, and it was then heralded as a remarkable feat that one of these machines had succeeded for the first time in flying across the English Channel, 21 miles wide. Although the U. S. Postoffice Department has established a transcontinental mail service by airplane, so little use is made of the airplane in the country of its birth that in order to see the best present development of the airplane and appreciate its wonderful possibilities an American has to visit Europe. This consideration together with the recollection of my thrilling experiences in 1910 in viewing from a balloon the pageant of King Edward's funeral procession and in my delightful balloon journey over Normandy (both described in November COMFORT of that year) were the chief enticements that lured me across the Atlantic the past summer.

A Side Trip in England

In London, where I had arrived after an uneventful ocean passage, I arranged to cover a part of England by airplane before beginning my tour of the continent. I will describe this side trip across the south of England by quoting from my diary.



Owing to cloudy skies early Friday morning we did not get our hop off for Penzance and Land's End at 7 o'clock as planned, but took the air at 9.30. I got up at 4.45, breakfasted at 5.30 and out to the aerodrom at Croydon, 13 miles from London, at 7. Had time to look about a bit. This is the base for all the big Continental air liners, as well as for local flyers. Three of the big machines that should have started for Paris at 5.30 this morning with loads of newspapers did not get away 'til 7.30 on account of cloudy weather, but I saw them start.

There are five regular lines, each car carrying 12 people, making two trips daily.

Today I have hired a special plane run by the Surrey Flying Service. My pilot—Youell—who got his wings in 1916, says this plane has joy rided all over Europe, carrying more than seven thousand passengers and is still going strong—has a speed of about 85 miles an hour and is a two seater, but I am the only passenger for her to carry on this ride. Croyden is a busy place most of the time, as machines are coming and going frequently through the day.

The Air Ministry keeps a strict control of all planes and all machines are put under rigid inspection very frequently so as to make them as safe as possible.

At 9.30, just as we are starting, the sun has come out bright and there is a pretty view going over the red tiled roofed houses and green fields with many trees surrounding. At 9.36 we passed over Epsom College and the race course where the Derby is run.

MR. GANNETT IN AIRPLANE AT BRISTOL, ENGLAND, JULY 22, 1922.

We went over Guildford at 9.55. It looked quite a large and prosperous city of beautiful houses laid out in squares and circles, in sort of community order.

This appearance of regularity in the layout of the new section of the city is due, I am told, to the new housing schemes of the Government. Where any large number of new houses have had to be built to supply the demand since the war, the authorities have planned to make every new locality a sort of Garden City, combining beauty with utility and convenience.

Ten o'clock: We passed over Aldershot, one of the big permanent military camps. Here also is Sandhurst, the military academy—the West Point of Great Britain—for cavalry and infantry training, the artillery branch being at Woolwich, a southeast suburb of London.

At 10.45 planed over an extensive forest.

We landed at Salisbury—Old Sarum—the school of Army Corporation, about 11, a nice place to land for petrol and oil.

We are now in the air again, having been down about an hour and making a good getaway.

Stonehenge is fascinating enough while one is on the ground, but from the air one gets a far better idea of the Giant's Circle and Sun Temples that were built of huge stones and earth mounds, presumably by the Druids, as one of their places of worship. The stones are of great weight. Some are 16 feet high and 18 feet in circumference.

There is much more visibility now; the clouds are running higher and so we are getting more breeze, too, for the machine gives a sudden lurch quite often, so I suppose this is what the pilots mean is getting more bumpy. Anyway, I don't feel at all like rocking the boat.

This sure is one grand panorama of small farms now for miles and miles ahead; behind and on all sides it is a level stretch of irregular hedged-in farms, no large towns in sight.

Twelve-thirty: We are approaching Yeovil, and the mountain range of Devonshire looms up in sight.

Pilot Not Eager

We made good landing here at Yeovil, having been in the air about 50 minutes since leaving Salisbury, and doing about 50 miles of flying. It is a private landing field and they make aeroplanes here.

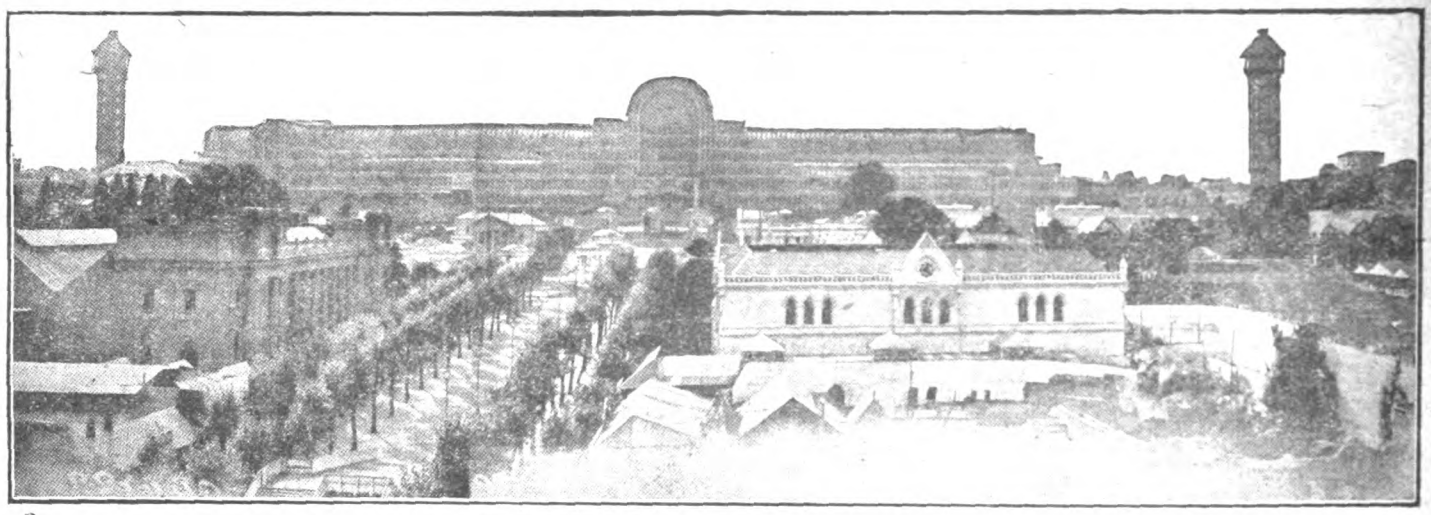
My pilot thinks on account of the strong wind we better not start for awhile, so we have lunch at the Three Cloughs Hotel, a quaint old inn in a more quaint town, in typical old English territory, and typical English weather, for it is raining hard now, for a change.

To tell the truth, my pilot does not seem to be very keen about continuing on to Penzance. He thinks it will be a rotten country in which to make a forced landing if any hard luck should happen to come our way, and there are no aerodromes anywhere along the way, so we would be going right away from our base of supplies.

And I, myself, did not want to get lost on the Dartmoor, of which terrible tales are told. Many square miles of it are uninhabited and it is full of bogs if one gets off the few main roads crossing it.

Airplanes on Skis

My pilot has been telling me something of his experience in Norway and Sweden the last three years. He was the first to run pleasure planes there, and had some wild experiences flying over the ice and snow with planes fitted with skis during the winter time. When it was fifty below zero, going ninety miles an hour—that beats our ice boating. He went near the Arctic regions, planing from Porjus to Norvik, Norway, seventy-five miles inside the Arctic circle.



He also started the first service from Stockholm to Helsingfors with Fairey Seaplane across the Baltic Sea; has carried more than four thousand passengers over frozen lakes in ski-fitted planes, with thermometer ranging 25 below zero. So think I would like that sort of winter sport. There is no planing in summer. He is getting careful now, as he is to be married next month, so is playing for safety, especially on this trip.

Four-forty: Our shower is over and we have a bright sun once more, so we start for Bristol, about 50 miles across country, where there is a good aerodrome and we can put up for the night very comfortably. The clouds are hanging low, so guess it's well we decided on this short run, for there is not much fun in planing through a fog, and now it is raining again.

Over Tourists' Haunts

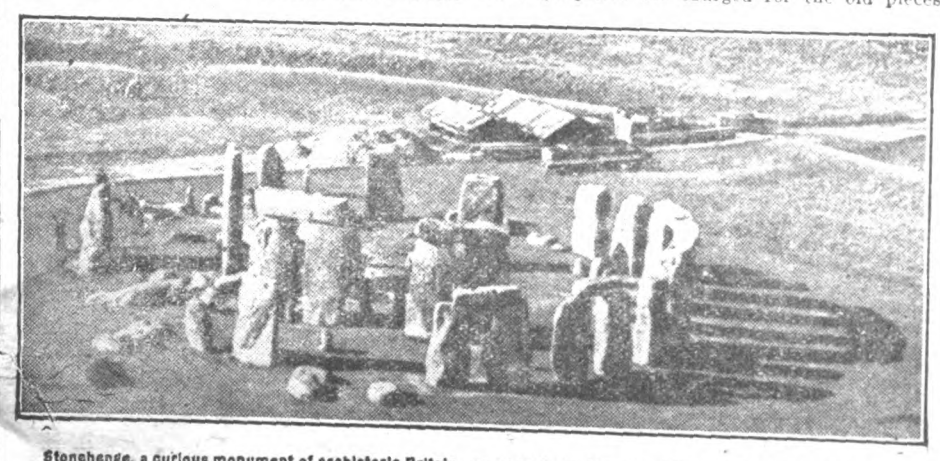
Our way is over the range of hills in Somerset County, known as the Mendips. These hills are of limestone formation and are honeycombed with cliffs and caverns. The Cheddar caves and several others are resorts of tourists who may explore the electrically lighted caverns, or who may go off looking for new discoveries in the way of caves. We are also passing over Glastonbury Abbey and Wells Cathedral, another haunt of tourists.

We will soon be on the ground once more, for we have just got sight of the Bristol Channel, and here is Bristol heaving in sight. And, my, but she is a big town.

CRYSTAL PALACE ON SOUTHERN HEIGHTS OF LONDON. ITS TWIN TOWERS SERVE AS GUIDES TO AIRPLANE PILOTS FOR LONDON LANDINGS.

Too Close for Comfort

We are flying low on account of clouds (800 feet) when we should be 3,000 feet in passing over a big city. It seems miles and miles across it, for the aerodrome is way on the other side of the town. But here we are, and it is a nice big landing place and very smooth, so we find we are here just as it stops raining, having made the fifty miles in forty minutes, the best run for the day, as the wind was not so strong against us.



There is an aeroplane factory here. They build some very fast machines, they say—one which is being kept secret is supposed to capture the cup for the Aerial Derby that is to be held in England in August. I saw the machine that won the Second Prize Derby last year; she has a speed of 170 miles an hour.

There is a peculiar sort of monoplane here with only 13 feet spread of wings that goes a hundred miles an hour and looks like a flivver.

Our plane has a 62 feet spread and has not been over 70 miles an hour today.

We go to the Royal Hotel for the night, five miles away by taxi.

Bristol is noted for its color printing establishments, large cocoa and chocolate, cigar and cigarette works, motor cars and aeroplanes, not to forget the breweries which seem to prevail in great numbers around here. The old Bristol potteries and glass works were famous in olden days and high prices are charged for the old pieces.

Stonehenge, a curious monument of prehistoric Britain, as seen from the air. Situated on Salisbury Plain, it is probably the most famous group of its kind in the world. The stones are of great weight, and some are 16 feet high and 18 feet in circumference. It is believed to be a relic of ancient Druidical worship.

One of the sights from the air over Bristol is the famous suspension bridge over the River Avon in the Clifton portion of the city. This span is 730 feet from cliff to cliff, 250 feet above the water. The bridge has had a wandering life, this being the third city in which it has been erected. It was first of all across the Thames opposite Charing Cross in London. Having outlived its usefulness in the previous locations, it still finds service in this section, and I was fortunate in obtaining an airscape showing its location.

An Offer of Thrills

Owing to rain we did not get started from Bristol till 3 P. M. Saturday and then hopped off for Birmingham—about a hundred miles away—where there is a good aerodrome. We intended to land there and then go on to Oxford, and thence London. We were speeding along splendidly at about thirty miles at an altitude of 1,500 feet when we began to run into fog and came down to 300 feet.

As there are hills 800 feet high ahead, the pilot suggested that we return to Bristol, so back we are, and he just gave a nice spiral again as we came down from 2,000 feet. He says he will do the corkscrew dive, cut the figure eight, or loop the loop with me, but I do not encouraging him ing that yet awhile. I did sort of enjoy the spiral, which was done very skillfully, and he seems to be very careful in all his doings.

Now that we are back in Bristol I have a little more time to look about the works. They have shown me the secret racer built for the Aerial Derby. It looks like an elongated flying egg with a fin on top and one set of wings. The body is six feet in diameter and 19 feet long and it has a 20-feet wing spread. The engine is of 500 horse-power and it is expected that the machine will make 220 miles per hour.

Although they build many small planes, they now have a very large one under construction—in fact, the biggest in the world. It is a cargo machine for Government use. It is a 1,000 horse-power tri-plane and will travel for nine hours at a speed of 100 miles per hour. It will carry a ton and a half of cargo and will have a total weight of seven tons. It will be a sort of father of the air fleet, carrying spare parts for other planes.

They are also building a new type of cross-channel flyers. They use American grown spruce in the construction and English birch for the limousines, which are afterwards covered with canvas.

Five.twenty: We have started on our return trip to London, going due eastward, the Pilot having prevented my taking a look down at Birmingham.

But as we started across country by this other route we hope to keep out of the fog.

As we are flying along under fairly fair skies we keep running into low hanging clouds at an altitude of about 700 feet. A lot of these cotton tony, fluffy and fleecy appearing clouds look like flocks of geese flying through the air, racing with one another, sometimes below us and sometimes above. As we planed along, the effect was very pretty.

Thames as Crooked as Jongo

In about an hour's flying we came in sight of the upper Thames near Henley and Reading. I never realized until looking down on it that the Thames is as crooked as the famous corkscrew Jongo River in Maine. It this time on a Saturday afternoon there seem to be a lot of gay boating parties. At one town there was a regatta in full swing. Gaily decorated boats and punts with prettily dressed girls, as well as decorated bathhouses on the shore, made a gala scene.

We ran into a smart shower but did not get wet, the upper plane acting as a roof and the rain slipping off it like water off a duck's back. The windshield, though only nine inches high, acts as a protection from the wind and water, and though out in the open, no water falls upon the passenger on account of the speed.

Passing over Lord Astor's estate near Maidenhead, we came in sight of the magnificent clubhouse of the Stoke Poges Golf Club. This great house was once a residence of some of the William Penn family. It is here, near the church where Grey wrote his Elegy, that the American Golfing Society holds some of its regular meetings on one of the most select and perfect golf courses in England.

Next we went over Windsor Castle, one of the homes of the present rulers of the British Empire, and circled in sight of the famous Ascot race course. Then came Staines and Hamilton Court with its Tudor palace beside the Thames. Then Richmond, and soon we came in view of the two distinct landmarks—the twin towers of the Crystal Palace situated on the heights of South London. Wherever one goes for miles in every direction around London those towers loom up and give the air pilot his bearings.

We arrived at the Croydon Aerodrome at 7.15, having been just under two hours coming 120 miles, getting there just as a great cross-channel air liner was landing from Paris. We saw another big air liner start across the channel for Ostend, in Belgium.

One Woman Air-Sick

I talked with some of the passengers of the arriving plane as they alighted from their Paris flight. One woman was quite air-sick but that was from the bad air of the closed limousine.

The nearest I came to the mal-de-air was when inhaling some of the fumes of the engine after we alighted at Salisbury. Then my stomach felt more upset than in a whole Atlantic crossing. I soon found it was hunger, having taken a light and very early breakfast. Some food soon put it right.

I went through all the air pockets—got all the bumps arising from tempestuous weather without any bad effects whatever.

Although I didn't see St. Ives, Penzance, Land's End or Birmingham, I certainly had a delightful two days of flying of about 500 miles and enjoyed my first European airplaning experience to the fullest extent, in spite of bad weather.

And we probably had as good weather on the days of our trip as we could generally find in England, as there have been 20 days when it has rained out of the 24, so far passed this month.

My pilot said he was always nervous in motor cars, though he admitted that all pilots are nervous when in the air not running their own machine.

For the Pilot to Consider

He was curious to know why one of my age should take to flying. I told him I took less chances than he did. I have enjoyed a long, full life, and at best—haven't a great number of years to look forward to, while he started flying at 16 years of age and even now, seven years later, has seen but a few of the years ordinarily allotted to man. So if there is any hazard in it, I think I have the better of it.

One is struck over here by the absence of motor traffic as compared with American cities. While the London bus is more in evidence than ever, the ordinary motor is conspicuous by its absence. There are said to be only six hundred thousand in Great Britain, against about seven million in America. This is owing to the cars costing twice, and gas three times, as much as at home.

Crossing the English Channel in Flight from London to Paris

Friday, July 28.—In my cross-channel flight from London to Paris today, I am taking the Grands Express Air Liner, as this line is the only one of the five London-Paris lines that runs direct to Geneva in Switzerland, to which I shall proceed tomorrow (See front cover illustrations).

The time required for the London-Paris trip is two and one-half hours, and from Paris to Lausanne on Lake Geneva is three hours.

The machines used by the different companies exhibit a general similarity of design. The bodies are of the limousine type fitted up with all the conveniences of a Pullman car and carry from ten to twelve passengers each. My plane can carry with the mechanic the lucky number of 13.

They are hung on finely adjusted compressed air and oil springs, like the Westinghouse spring of an automobile, so when they taxi across the field in starting or landing there is hardly any vibration felt.

Fourteen O'clock

I am starting at 2 o'clock, which by the French railway methods is reckoned as 14 o'clock. Everything is done for one's comfort and ease on these trips. Each passenger is allowed thirty pounds of baggage free, and steamer trunks are accepted at a rate not in excess of the charge one would pay by express, and as the trunk goes along with you, there is no worry of waiting for a week or ten days for the baggage to turn up at the end of the journey.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE AT BRISTOL AS SEEN FROM AIRPLANE.

What strikes me most as I get into the machine is its enormous size as compared with the small plane in which I took my trip about England just a week ago. Here we have arm-chairs with cushions, electric lights and electric heater, mirrors, clock, periodicals to read and an uninterrupted view obtained through windows made to be open or closed as desired so that good ventilation is assured. Drinking water is provided.

Speed and height indicators answer many questions that would naturally arise in our minds, luggage racks take care of our hand bags. A rear compartment contains a lavatory. All these large air liners are fitted with Marconi wireless telephones and, I believe, on some lines even refreshments are served.

One can move about the passenger compartments and by using a little cotton wool in one's ears the noise of the twin engines is not disagreeable.

Today has given us the brightest skies and best weather for flying for the past eight days.

I can't help thinking of the marvel of this method of travel and its advantages over all others. By train and steamer I would not only have the disagreeable Channel crossing, but I would be, at the least, seven hours on the journey to Paris. Here we are making this trip in two hours and a half. And whereas the cost of first-class railway and boat travel works out at about seven cents a mile, this more modern way costs only twelve cents.

AIRPLANE ROUTE LONDON TO GENEVA.

A Favorable Start

We have made a quick and easy get-away, banking against the wind and swinging in a circle to get pointed to the proper route, a little south of east until we get across the channel when the route will veer a little to the south.

Leaving the twin towers of Crystal Palace behind, we are passing over the aerodrome at Biggin Hill, which will be one of three base aerodromes of the British Air Force in the defences of London, about twenty miles away.

I was not more than half a mile above the ground on my recent aeroplane trip, and in my balloon experience a mile high is the greatest I have ever soared, but now we are going up two miles high, so the sensation is a little different from any I have heretofore felt in the brief space taken to rise from one altitude to another, going from cloud to cloud, and the effect is very beautiful when we emerge after going through dense mist for a few moments into clear blue sky, with the sun shining warm and brightly.

It seems very nice to be able to stand up and change one's overcoat from a lighter to a heavier one while we are thus in air transit, for while it was very warm below it is a bit cooler higher up.

Ashford is passed. Maidstone is discernable and in the distance we see the ribbon of water which is the English Channel, twenty-five miles wide at the point where we are to cross. Now we can see from Ramsgate to Dungeness, the day is so clear. The promontory of Cape Grisnez on the French coast comes into view as we are leaving the British shore.

At less than a mile high I am having the finest channel crossing I ever experienced—after thirty-five minutes flying from Croydon—and can look down through the openings in the clouds on the steamers plying through the water in the Channel below.

There is absolutely no perceptible motion to our airship; she is going along as steady as one could wish. There is a circling range of snow-white clouds far ahead that looks for all the world like high snow-covered mountains, some tall individual peaks standing far above the others in very irregular order.

The French air pilot, who cannot speak English, is a very jolly fellow and is laughing at me while I write. He wants to know what it's all about.

In Sight of Land

We again come in sight of land, so will soon be sailing over French soil, and it seems nice at last to be able to say that I have crossed the English Channel without being seasick. I have certainly been fortunate in having such a calm, clear day to try the experiment. (Perhaps it is because it is Friday—and the machine carries thirteen people.)

The country we pass over as we cross into France is not unlike that of the British Isles in appearance, one very large wooded area showing up on my left.

It is much easier to write in these large closed-in machines than it was in the small one I toured in last week, and it is quite easy to carry on conversation here, where it was impossible then, on account of noise from the engine.

More of these indescribably beautiful, misty, frothy-effect, iceberg-looking mountains of whiter-than-snow clouds are beneath us. I feel as though I wanted to jump out into them, they look so much like fleecy, fluffy down. With the bright sun shining down on the mass of cotton batting it seems as though one would just naturally and comfortably be absorbed in it. While at a distance they may look like ice and snow, when you are nearly in them they seem soft and dainty.

Clean, Quick and Restful

This surely does seem like an awful cosy and very quick and restful way to get from London to Paris, as compared with the dirty train, slow, uncomfortable boat, and then more miserable train travel with many changes and rotten service all along the way. I have a nice seat out in the nose of the machine, so get a fine, first-hand view of all scenery, and can take in all that goes on ahead, above, below and on all sides, so am thoroughly air-wise to everything passing.

Now we are making a quick descent, for we are nearing Paris and are coming down from nearly 9,000 feet to a much lower level before our landing—so my nose-seat is a good place to watch out from as we dive smartly for the ground.

Yes, here is the Eiffel Tower coming into view, although very petite looking. The Seine is beneath us and the great aerodrome with its many sheds just ahead at Le Bourget which has these large letters worked in the sod.

We touched ground at just 4.40 P. M., having been exactly two and a half hours making the trip of 215 miles. It surely has been a most enjoyable one.

I start in the same plane and with the same pilot for Switzerland at 9.30 in the morning. Our pilot on this trip is Favroeau, and I was told before leaving Croyden that he had made over five hundred air trips of this sort. He has been flying for 12 years and bore a brave part in the late war.

Paris to Geneva—Winging Our Way Over the Alps

Saturday, July 29.—This morning dawns clear and warm, just enough soft breeze stirring, and in the right direction, to make our flight into Switzerland very favorable.

This aerodrome at Le Bourget is unusually large, covering two square miles or more of level ground—they are to build a large hotel here—and has hundreds of hangars circled around the outside. There are many machines in the air here at all times of the day—small, large and medium sized. Our air liner is one of the largest.

While our trip from London covered over two hundred miles, we have more than three hundred to go today.

I am fortunate in having a man and his wife for nearest neighbors in the car who can speak good English as well as French. They are making an air trip from London to their old home in Switzerland for a holiday, he now being a big wine merchant in London. They are much pleased with this form of travel and took many snaps of cloud and other effects as we journeyed over to Paris.

We are leaving the ground at 9.49 just like a bird, and thus begin our long flight in very calm air and just a bit of soft haze. There are twelve persons aboard—only three of us speaking English.

Over the Battlefields

At 10 o'clock we are now passing over La Chapette, about thirty-five miles from Paris, planing at quite low altitude but slowly rising. We can easily look down on where the Germans passed on their first drive toward Paris in 1914.

What is it? Are we getting into trouble on account of our motors not going quite properly? Paris has just radioed for us to return, so we are now turning around.

No. The last report is that there are two passengers who got left, and we are to go back for them. Now they say it is one. Well, we are on our return, anyway, and will have a longer ride, but take a late lunch in Geneva, evidently.

Our pilot—Pilot Favroeau—of yesterday is a passenger today and sitting directly behind me, so my interpreter friend is keeping me informed, and I thus do not feel at all worried. And as long as it is the thirteenth one we are after, guess it must be our mascot.

We made a very quick return and are now landing at 10.40, for they say the lost passenger showed up just after we made our hop-off. Don't think a railroad train or a steamboat would trouble to do this, but it shows what close communication we are in with the home office.

We have been flying at 4,200 feet.

Well, our man has been found to be a woman. "Just like a woman to make us come back," but giving us eighty miles more air voyaging. The woman can speak English and says the London office told her to be on hand at 10 o'clock instead of 9 o'clock as we were told—so the woman is "right as usual." They are changing one of the propellers; guess we might have returned anyway. My, but it is hot in the sun waiting on the ground in this closed car when one is dressed for high altitudes. But it doesn't matter as long as we find our engines are all right and have had this wonderful demonstration of what use the wireless telephone can be put to.

The Mascot "Thirteen" Works

At 11.10 we are starting the engines and at 11.13 we are leaving the ground once more, and guess we are off for a fine trip, for the thirteens are all working right.

We have journeyed along safely until we have just passed Chantillon-sur-Seine. At thirteen o'clock—French time—we have come 150 miles the last hour and three-quarters. We are keeping up a good average of the ordinary speed of this machine—about 85 miles an hour.

Mt. Blanc has just come into view—over 150 miles away—and there is a large circle of what look like mountains running away to the left, but they are the clouds that have such a snow-capped mountain effect. We are now about half way to our journey's end at one o'clock—London time.

Dijon is now being passed, 1.16 P. M. There is an aerodrome here and Mt. Blanc looms up much more distinctly. We are headed directly for it—plenty of woods, but not much water beneath us.

One misses the big lakes of Maine.

Dole is passed at 1.40. There seem to be a lot of medium-sized towns at what looks to be five to ten miles apart, all through this country.

We are still flying at about 8,000 feet, which is higher than Mt. Washington—the highest peak of the White Mountain range—and as we approach near to Mt. Blanc, which is about twice as high as we fly, it does not appear so high or as big as it did in the distance. But this is because we are now in good view of all the Alpine range that runs to and from this great mountain of the Alps, with the Jungfrau (14,800 feet high), or just a little less height, in the distance. We get near Mt. Jura about 100 miles east of Mt. Blanc, so have these lesser mountains to form an idea by comparison with the size of the greater ones in a real close-up fashion. Dent du Midi seems to stand up pretty high between us and Mt. Blanc for we go quite near this seemingly high peak, but there are hundreds of lesser size that look very grand.

The entire effect, taken together with the neighboring floating white clouds, makes a grand and inspiring sight in this clear, bright sunlight, for this great glacial group of peaks and snow-covered heights, stretching for miles and miles, is strongly accentuated and brought out more clearly by the dark green foothills, or small tree-covered mountains we are now passing over.

Lake Geneva Comes Into View

We also look down on a fort—a large fortification cut into the lower line of hills—as we approach closer to the snow-capped higher Alps. A long, narrow lake is also in view on our right, and on our left is a large lake—Lake Neuchatel. And now we can see Lake Geneva, where we are going to land, first at Lausanne, right on its shore. It is about fifty miles long and several miles wide, with Geneva at its head and Lausanne near the foot.

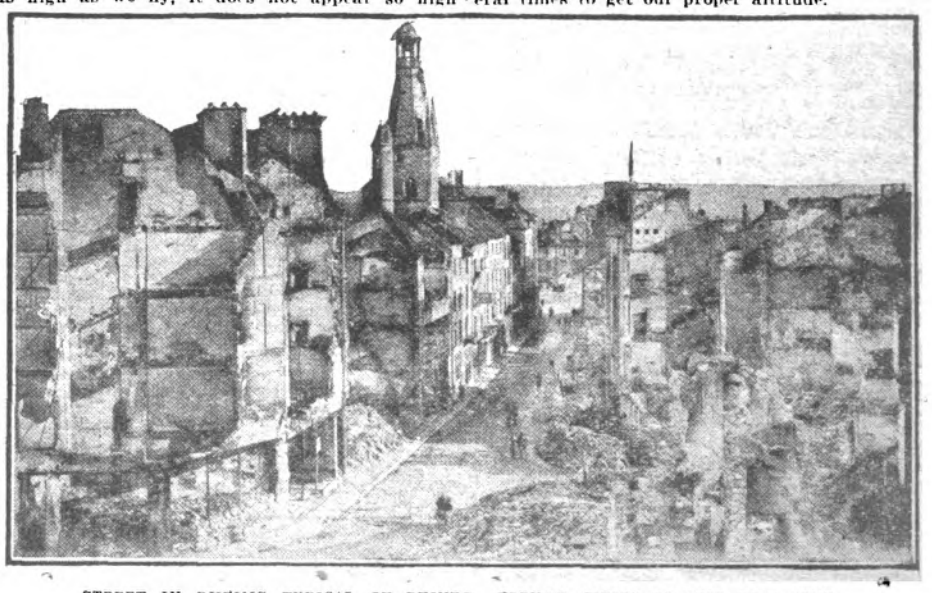
This is a very thickly-settled plateau having many large towns surrounding, and Lausanne itself has over 40,000 inhabitants, while Geneva has over 100,000.

THIS PIG WENT TO MARKET BY AIRPLANE EXPRESS.

We circle all around it as we dip down from our great height so can get a fine view of all the country, and even looked down to the bottom of the lake, at the shores, for we are out over the water part of the time in our process of landing. The machine behaves beautifully and we make a very steady spiraling as we gently wind around and around in large circles during the five minutes we take in dropping.

Now here we are at 2.35 P. M. safely on the ground, and quite a lot of people here to greet us to Switzerland. (See front cover illustration.)

Off to Geneva



While my ticket was only bought for a passage to Lausanne, they have lately arranged to have the machines go on to Geneva, so after waiting here for about an hour for some of our passengers to disembark and to fill up our tanks with petrol, we make another hop-off for Geneva, where I am going to stay for a week to attend the International Balloon and other races, and take short trips by train and boat to the nearby winter sports towns, to find out all I can about skiing and other winter pastimes.

There is a view of a long mountain range from the aerodrome here but only a few bits of snow can be seen on any of the mountain sides and none on the tops.

In looking the aeroplane over as she rests quietly and innocently here on the ground I cannot make it seem possible that this simple looking bit of canvas-covered frame-work has brought us so safely, quickly and easily over land and over sea from such a far-away country, passing over all sorts of territory at such high altitude and at such a rapid rate, landing us at whatever station we wished to stop so quietly and without seeming effort, and all the time we have been in constant talking communication with our home office. I am proud of the fact that this was an American invention.

There is only one plane a week coming to Switzerland now as the traffic has not been developed yet.

We make our getaway for Geneva at 3.45 and have a good view of Swiss chalets dotted along the hillsides as we fly away from this clean and beautiful looking city, which we circle over several times to get our proper altitude.

STREET IN RHEIMS TYPICAL OF RUINED FRENCH CITIES IN THE WAR ZONE.

There are many small boating places along the shores of the big lake, and we soar out over its smooth water like a kingfisher looking for a meal from its depths.

A World Flight in Prospect

I am rather glad I took my personally conducted flight last week, for it has sort of put me more air-wise and makes me feel more at home and at ease while taking this longer trip. It will fit me for a trip around the world which I hope to live long enough to enjoy.

We are at present flying out over the middle of the lake and I don't suppose it would be any worse to get drowned than to be dashed to pieces on land should we happen to come suddenly down.

The water looks like a beautiful green carpet, anyway—it's so smooth.

We pass near enough to Mt Blanc now to get a more direct view of its length as well as height. Geneva itself is now before us and we are soon to bid adieu to this grand old air boat, having had a most delightful and restful journey in her

Radio Flashes

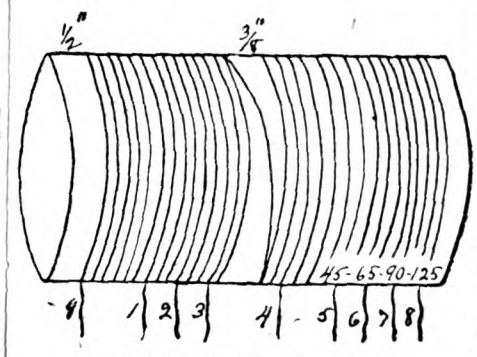
Radio Construction of a Short Wave Regenerative Receiving Set

PART I.

IN answer to the great number of inquiries as to the construction of a receiving set capable of receiving music from long distances, we are publishing a complete set of instructions which, if carefully followed, will enable any of our readers to build for themselves a set that will receive signals from stations up to 800 or 1,000 miles distant under favorable atmospheric conditions.

A complete list of material needed for this set is here given and the reader will be able to purchase these parts from any radio supply house.

Material Necessary for Construction of Tuner and Audion



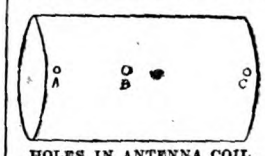
One 43 plate variable condenser.
One wood baseboard, 16 inches by 7 inches by 5-8 inch; quartered oak is preferable.
One panel of Bakelite, wood or hard rubber, 16 inches by 6 inches by 3-16 inch; wood is not desirable.
One cardboard or Bakelite tube 6 inches long and 3½ inches diameter.
One cardboard tube 2 inches long and 2½ inches diameter.
Eight binding posts.
One 6-inch length of ¼-inch round brass rod.
Four 6-32 round-head machine screws 1 inch long.
Four 8-32 beveled-head machine screws 2 inches long.
Twelve 8-32 brass nuts.
Twelve 3-16 brass washers.
One switch arm, 1 inch radius.
Eight switch points.
Two switch stops.
One piece copper or tin-foil 16 inches by 6 inches.
Four 6-32 nuts.
Five 1 inch wood screws.
One filament rheostat, 6 ohm.
One tube socket.
One grid leak and condenser.
One foot brass stock ½ inch by ⅛ inch.
One Jack (radio).
One-half pint shellac.
Twelve fiber washers.

The above material includes everything necessary to build the set. It does not, however, include the audion tube, A and B battery and phones which are necessary for the operation of the set.

The Antenna Coil

The antenna coil consists of the cardboard tube 6 inches long and 3½ inches diameter wound with No. 22 single cotton covered copper wire in the following manner:

Starting at left-hand side of the coil, leave one-half inch space and start the winding and wind 10 turns. At the 10th turn take a tap off the wire, making as neat a connection as possible. After the tap has been taken, wind 5 more turns and take off second tap. Wind 5 more turns and take tap No. 3. Wind 5 more turns and then instead of making the 6th turn close to the rest of the turns, carry it across a



WINDING THE ANTENNA COIL.

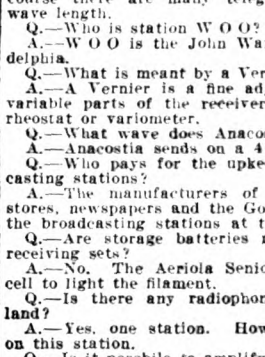
¾ inch space, which will leave this space clear, and wind on 5 more turns and take off 4th tap. After 4th tap has been taken, continue winding until the 45th turn is reached and then take off tap No. 5. Continue and take off tap No. 6 at the 65th turn, tap No. 7 at the 90th turn, and stop at the 125th turn and use end of coil for 8th tap.

This gives a coil about 3½ inches long of 125 turns and 9 taps (counting starting end of wire). Give the coil a good coat of shellac. The tap should be soldered close to the coil and care must be taken not to get flux on the windings. The taps must all be taken off the same side of the coil.

Along the length of the coil, and in exact line with each other, make three holes as follows:

HOLES IN ANTENNA COIL.

A is a 3-16 inch hole, ¼ inch from left end of tube. B is a ¼ inch hole, 1⅛ inch from A which should locate it in center of ⅜ inch space left in coil.



C is a 3-16 inch hole 2⅞ inches from B, which should bring it ¼ inch from right end of tube. Diametrically opposite these holes, a smaller set of holes should be made and two 3-16 inch holes should be made to take the mounting screws which fasten the coil to the baseboard. This completes the antenna core and care must be taken to properly care for this coil until the remainder of the set is ready for assembly.

The Tickler Coil

The next step is the construction of the tickler coil. This coil consists of a small movable tube which rotates inside the antenna coil.

The tickler coil is wound on a cardboard tube 2 inches long and 2½ inches diameter. Wind 25 turns on the left side of the tickler coil, leave a space similar to the space left on the antenna coil and wind 25 more turns.

A ¼ inch hole should be made in each side of the tube in the exact center and diametrically opposite, to take the shaft. The shaft consists of two pieces of brass rod (round) ¼ inch diameter, one piece 3⅜ inches long, the other 2 inches long.

TICKLER COIL WINDING.

These two rods are placed in the two ¼ inch holes of the tube and should be shellacked to prevent them from slipping.

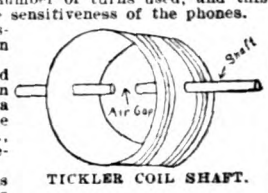
Connect one end of the tickler winding to one piece of shafting and the other end to the opposite shaft. A small air gap should be left inside the tickler coil between the ends of the shafts.

The tickler coil is now complete, and in the next issue we will continue with the construction of the panel, baseboard, etc.

Questions and Answers

Q.—Is it possible to use the electric light wires for a receiving aerial?

A.—Yes. Several plugs for this purpose are on the market and some are exceptionally good.



Q.—Who is station K.S.D.?

A.—Station K.S.D. is located at St. Louis, Mo.

Q.—What does 2,000 ohms mean in regard to telephone receivers?

A.—Telephone receivers are rated according to resistance because this is a means of telling an approximate size of wire and number of turns used, and this of course determines the sensitiveness of the phones.

Q.—How far is it possible to hear on an Aeriola Senior Set?

TICKLER COIL SHAFT.

A.—We have received Louisville, Ky., here in Maine on the Aeriola Senior and some of the nearer stations, viz., Newark, Pittsburg, Detroit and Schenectady.

Q.—How many turns should a variocoupler have on the antenna coil winding?

A.—Your question is answered in the text of our Radio Flashes.

Q.—Is it possible to receive from arc stations with a crystal?

A.—No. The crystal is not suitable as it is necessary to hetrodyne the incoming signals from an arc transmitter.

Q.—Do any stations send on 600 meters?

A.—If you mean telephone stations, no, but of course there are many telegraphic stations on that wave length.

Q.—Who is station W O O?

A.—W O O is the John Wanamaker stores in Philadelphia.

Q.—What is meant by a Vernier on a radio receiver?

A.—A Vernier is a fine adjustment of some of the variable parts of the receiver such as the condenser, rheostat or variometer.

Q.—What wave does Anacostia, D. C., send on?

A.—Anacostia sends on a 412 meter wavelength.

Q.—Who pays for the upkeep of the various broadcasting stations?

A.—The manufacturers of radio sets, department stores, newspapers and the Government are controlling the broadcasting stations at the present time.

Q.—Are storage batteries necessary for all audion receiving sets?

A.—No. The Aeriola Senior requires only one dry cell to light the filament.

Q.—Is there any radiophone broadcasting in England?

A.—Yes, one station. However, we have no data on this station.

Q.—Is it possbile to amplify a crystal detector?

A.—Yes, if the signal is strong enough to be heard on a crystal it may be amplified in the same manner the detector tube is from London to Geneva, thus linking the Thames in a triple alliance with the meeting of the rivers Arve and Rhone, which blend their clear and muddy waters together, and which can be seen in magnificent grandeur as we spiral quickly down to their shores.

Landscape in a Grand Jazz

But the pilot is sure giving us a dandy spiral spin in coming down this time, for we are getting an awful turning upside down in the quick descent, so I don't know whether I am dizzy or not, but have kept right on writing my story which thus ends in one grand whirl of delightful twirls, and we are again on the ground at 4.25.

I suppose these corkscrew turnings and twistings could have been demonstrated to us in most any locality, but I don't know of a place where the setting is more adapted to, or the landscape more harmonious for, a topsy-turvying and grand jazzing together of earth, sky and water—steamboats, sailboats, rowing and motorboats, animals, automobiles and carriages, trees and swans—than lies right at this mountain-surrounded spot of Geneva. For all of these things seem to be put into one big melting pot and stirred around into one great mass of rapid moving kaleidoscopic changeable mixture, representing the grand upheaval of this old Mother Earth of ours; most everything excepting the fishes, moon and stars seems to have been included in the grand mixup of twisting and turnings and heavings, for the sun—yes, Old Sol himself—was conspicuously represented in this quick pin-wheel turning dive when everything seemed to be coming up from the ground and hitting you in the face. It was the grandest thrill I have yet had—this razzle-dazzle air jazzing.

The pilot took us right into the big shed safe and sound at an easy gait as he carefully taxied across the field.

As I reach my hotel, which is the Les Bergues, I find it is located right on the lakeside, and directly in front of Rousseau Island and the beautiful twin bridges, so as I sit on the balcony and sip my tea, after my long and pleasurable air trip from London to Geneva, I can watch the many swans sporting about me in their wired enclosure, and quietly think over the events of the last twenty-four hours, for we were hardly six hours in the air, flying over five hundred miles. I hope many of my friends will be able to make the same trip in as comfortable a manner as I have, before many years pass.

To be continued in December number, in which Mr. Gannett will describe the great International Balloon Race, at Geneva, for the Gordon Bennett prize, and tell about his visits to the battlefields and devastated regions in France and Belgium, and of the quaint beauty of busy little Holland.

Forty-Mile Trap-Line

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CHAPTER III.

THE first of November found the two young wilderness trappers, Lon Baker and "Tubs" Johnson, extremely busy getting the last of their traps set. In the high mountain altitudes of the Northern states, furs are usually prime by this date, and the boys had been taking some fur bearers not protected by game laws for several days, and the furs had proved of excellent quality.

A week had been spent in setting the hundred traps the boys now had out in a long circle of about two or three traps to the mile. Thus the trap-line was fully forty miles long. While it took six days to establish the line, the trappers expected to cover it in three days, tending the traps, except they expected to have their schedule occasionally interrupted by storms. After the traps had been set, many of them in newly made cubbies, the trappers had to construct two overnight camps. The nights had not been cold while setting the traps and the boys had slept in a canvas lean-to in front of a fire which had been permitted to die out during the night. But the rigid winter weather would require a warm camp, to say the least, so the boys built small cabins, completing both in a week's time.

For heating in one of the camps, a small folding sheet-iron stove was set up; in the other was built a fireplace. It happened to be located near a clay bank and was convenient to flat rocks and a day had sufficed to see the finish of the rough but serviceable fireplace. There were only three cooking utensils necessary at this camp: a skillet, a light-weight Dutch oven and a quart size pot which served the all-purpose of a receptacle for boiling meat, hot water, tea or coffee. Tubs declared the Dutch oven cooked bread so deliciously, he wanted to stay at the camp all the time; and often during the winter days that followed he went out of his way to stop and cook his meal in the oven. Sometimes he made a pone of corn-cake in one side of the oven and cooked venison in the other side, and such a meal was never surpassed for deliciousness by any food served at old Delmonico's, the once famous New York restaurant.

Tubs began to become impatient for the actual trapping, and when the cabins were finished he whooped and shouted with elation, under the impression that all the hard, monotonous work was now over with and that there would be nothing to do but harvest the trap-lines of their rare, fine furs. But the more practical Lon cooled his enthusiastic partner down considerably by asking how he expected to cook and keep warm during the forty-below zero weather without two or three cords of wood at each one of the camps. This statement sure did put a damper on Tubs' enthusiasm, but his spirits revived when Lon informed him there would be a lull in their work, as the traps set out would need attention.

It was a cool, frosty morning when the two trappers left the line cabin farthest from their headquarters camp en route over the long trap-line. Some of the traps along streams, where the catches would be safely drowned, had been set eight days, a sufficient time for any skilled trapper to expect results. Lon was in the lead, carrying his rifle in readiness for any chance game, and Tubs followed behind, less alert, for it was requiring most of his energy to keep up the pace with some degree of silence.

The wisdom of Lon's habit of always gliding silently and watchfully through the woods was soon demonstrated. The boys had crossed a ravine and reached the crest of a knoll, when Lon's keen eyes caught a movement on the next ridge. At once the animal went out of sight. Lon's first impulse was to examine the ground and he soon located a fox trail, plainly visible in the heavy frost. Their own trail was nearly parallel with that of the reynard. Rushing to the top of the next ridge, where the fox disappeared, Lon saw the animal's body clearly outlined against the white ice of a nearby lake, but too far away to shoot at.

"Tubs, that fox isn't out parading after daylight for nothing. I'll bet my interest in today's catch it is headed out for a feed off that deer paunch on the lake shore a quarter of a mile from here—the one we set traps around," remarked Lon.

"You're about right, Lon. But how about the traps? Won't we find it in them?"

"Not by a jugful, Tubs. If there isn't something in the traps by this time, you may be sure they're not in working order, and this fox wouldn't be visiting the place. These animals are so wary they will not even approach a place where there is a trap, if they know it, however tempting the bait," was Lon's reply, continuing: "Now, Tubs, you've got to walk like an Indian from here on. We'll take to the crest of this hill and follow it until we come within sight of the trap set. We will then be within easy rifle range of the fox, if it stopped there."

The boys, with rifles loaded in readiness for quick action, proceeded silently through the forest, something the frost on the leaves enabled them to do. As they came within sight of the set, Lon first glimpsed the fox, and motioned for Tubs to freeze in his tracks. Just at this moment it looked up from the fetid bait and glanced uneasily around, acting much like a dog that had been in at a sheep killing. Slowly Lon raised his rifle and taking quick aim fired, scoring a dead shot at seventy-five yards.

As the trapper had surmised, the traps had disappeared, and now the boys were in for some expert trailing. Each of the two traps had been clogged to short poles so they would drag crosswise, and of sufficient size to insure the safe capture of an animal as large as the fox or fisher. Starting from the set, the traps were not extremely hard to trail where they had turned over leaves and caught on logs and snags, and both traps were located within five hundred yards of the set; one contai'ning a fox, the other a 'coon.

"You can see here the advantage of clogging traps," remarked Lon. "That fox we shot wouldn't have come to the set had there been any sign of a trap around. An animal caught in a clogged trap always gets away from the set quickly, thus little disturbing the surroundings."

Already the boys had a fair day's catch and it was sunup before the three pelts were removed. The next half-dozen traps failed to produce any furs, although some of the sets needed attention. A blue jay was in one of the traps, and another trap was sprung with nothing in it. Such is the luck of the trap-line. But soon the boys were to experience some excitement. In a belt of hardwood timber were two or three cubby pen sets for fisher. The first set was undisturbed; the second needed fixing, and while Lon was putting it in shape, Tubs raced off to look at the next trap. Lon had just finished the set when he heard a yell that would have done justice to a scalped Indian, and he hurried in the direction Tubs was last seen. He was in time to intercept this young trapper in a mad race for his life, apparently, while Lon saw the cause of the commotion in the form of a large fisher, now securely hung up by the dangling trap chain to a snag. Tubs had incautiously approached the cubby pen from the back side, and had not seen the crouching fisher until within a few feet of it. The animal had jumped toward the trapper, and if it had not been for the clog catching on a projection, the trapper may have been disabled if not badly injured, for the fisher is a vicious animal when in a trap. As it was, Tubs was merely badly scared and a little out of wind from his record-breaking run.

Lon procured a solid club about three feet long, and stepping forward with his eyes focused on the animal, was enabled to get close enough to end its career with one blow across the head. This was the largest fisher Lon had ever seen and its fur was unusually dark.

"That's a hundred-dollar pelt, Tubs, according to the price-lists being sent out this year by the big fur houses," stated Lon, admiringly stroking the glossy fur. After the trap was reset and the pen straightened up, the boys proceeded to skin the animal, exercising great care neither to cut holes in the hide nor remove superfluous fat and flesh.

The trappers again started over the trap-line, now making calculations on their time so as to reach camp before dark. Very few trappers care to be out traveling in a wilderness after dark, and when caught out unavoidably, it is always advisable to camp over night. But the boys were not equipped for spending a night in the open and did not relish sleeping in the cool air without blankets. While they intended to visit all their sets, yet the line was so arranged that a few loops or out-of-the-way traps could be skipped at any time, if necessary to enable the trappers to reach camp by dark.

The boys walked fast between sets, taking long, loping strides down the mountainsides, only halting occasionally to shoot a red squirrel for mink and marten bait. The trap-line next paralleled the bank of a stream for a few miles, and the catches consisted mostly of raccoon and mink. Their sets had been made intentionally to keep out muskrats, as these little water animals were not prime in November, although they would grade as "Fall" and fetch a fair price if sold on a quantity basis. However, the boys were taking too many fine, wilderness furs to care to bother with farm-land animals like the muskrat and skunks; both animals were scarce, anyway, especially the latter. The mink is a very small animal, seldom weighing over four pounds, and when one was taken the boys chucked it in the packsack to skin at camp. Invariably the larger animals were skinned on the trap-line.

By keeping close tabs on passing time, the trappers were able to reach their over-night camp without missing any traps. Then a quick supper followed and a couple or hours put in skinning a mink, a marten and stretching and boarding all the furs, a total of seven pieces for one day's catch. This catch represented over a hundred dollars and Tubs was calling himself all kinds of fools for not having taken up the profession of trapping sooner in life. Lon took matters more calmly, for his long experience had convinced him that invariably the first few days of trapping prove the most profitable, and that many fruitless days will be put in running the trap-line during midwinter weather, when the work is hardest and catches smallest.

The next day passed in a similar manner to the first, except they did not catch another fisher or marten, but had taken more 'coons and two mink instead of one. Unfortunately a weasel had blundered into a marten set and had to be thrown away for its fur was still streaked with yellow.

"One less enemy for the partridges and other game birds," Lon said, as he gave the weasel a toss fifty feet from the set. "In another two weeks its pelt would have been white and worth a couple of dollars."

Later in the season when the snows got deep and many fur bearers went into hibernation, the boys set out several weasel lines and made some large catches. This little fur animal has a valuable pelt, considering its small size, and inasmuch as it travels all winter, is a great boon to the trappers. Any fresh meat bait will entice them into traps.

The next two weeks went by fast, as time always does to anyone busily employed. The boys set in supplying their camps with wood, running the lines between times, and stretching the pelts at night. Each camp now contained a large bunch of furs, and the boys never gave a thought to thieves—such is the security of the deep woods. Later they did move all their furs as fast as they were cured to the headquarters camp, because of the better facilities for storing out of reach of mice and other pests.

The snow was now piling up almost two feet deep on the level and the trappers were using their snowshoes and working like beavers every day breaking new trails and moving up traps that had been set in the open. The fur catch began to fall off noticeably during the stormy weather; in fact they were only making catches at the protected sets in snag cubbies. 'Coons had hibernated, mink were living under the ice and only weasel, fisher, marten and fox were traveling to any great extent.

One morning late in November the boys got up and were surprised to find a clear sky. The storm had subsided. They stood in front of the camp watching the sun creep over Yellow Cat Mountain, a steep peak about four miles away, but seemingly, on a clear day, not more than a mile distant.

"Tubs," exclaimed Lon, "d'ye see that first bench on the mountain? Looks low but it'd take a mile climb to reach it. Anyway, I'll wager there are good marten grounds on that mountain. Suppose we run a line over that bench today?"

"Bright idea of yours, Lon. Couldn't have thought of anything better myself," the partner agreed.

Immediately the boys loaded a toboggan with traps and bait and taking their guns, started for the mountain, which they reached a couple of hours after sunup. The first bench was covered with green timber, mixed with hardwood toward the upper side. The trap setters struck in at the lower edge of the evergreens and worked upwards toward the hardwoods. Frequently they scared up deer, which were bedded down comfortably sheltered from the late snowstorms.

The boys had traveled slowly, setting traps at frequent intervals until noon, then they stopped to "boil the kettle," in woodsmen's parlance, in other words, make tea and eat a lunch. They talked over the prospects of the new trap-line. Marten signs, freshly made, had been abundant in the thickets and around old windfalls, especially. The toboggan had been cached at the foot of the mountain and the traps carried in packsacks; now more than half of the traps had been set out. The boys were preparing to eat in a deep ravine, where they had gone in the expectation of finding a stream unfrozen in the rapids.

Suddenly Lon sat up rigid and stopped gnawing at a snowshoe rabbit's leg to listen.

"Just the wind whipping around old Yellow Cat peak," assured Tubs, pouring himself a steaming cup of tea.

"Wind, nothing," exclaimed Lon, "that's too much noise for a wind."

By now the noise had increased considerably, so that both boys were convinced no wind could produce such a roar. As the seconds passed the roar increased and seemed to be coming down out of the clear sky. Both boys began to feel concerned. Suddenly Lon turned pale, when the impending danger dawned upon him.

"Quick, Tubs, grab the stuff and let's run. That's a landslide coming, or a snowslide. It's been snowing around that peak for days before it ever snowed down near our camps. Come on.

We'll run for that rock ledge, an' if we don't make it, we're goners."

Tubs gathered his rifle and other belongings into his arms and looked up in time to see Lon already racing for the rock bluffs about three hundred yards away, directly toward the on-coming slide. Then he looked up and saw a cloud of dry snow in the air, so high the entire top of Yellow Cat peak was hidden. The roar had now become deafening. He dropped the traps and ran as he had never run before. He saw Lon reach the first ledge safely, then he looked up and saw a mass of trees and snow seemingly shoot out over the bluff, directly over him. In another second he would be buried.

Even as the tons of debris descended, Tubs' instinct for life never left him. He glanced around frantically, like a scared rabbit, and glimpsing a crevice between two large rocks, dived into it. He heard his partner yell and the next moment everything went dark, as the huge mass of rocks, snow and timber came down and filled the ravine.

How to Prepare Fur for Market

WRONG methods of skinning, stretching and drying pelts cause the loss of thousands of dollars to trappers every year. The right methods to follow are just as easy if you know them. Here they are:

Skinning methods are of two kinds, "casing" and "open." Casing means peeling the skin off whole. Open means ripping the skin down the belly.

Animals which should be cased are the following: Mink, marten, weasel, opossum, fox, fisher, skunk, civet, muskrat, wildcat, otter, lynx, wolf and wolverine. Open skinning should be used with coon, badger, beaver, bear and cougar.

The following skins, before they become too dry, should be turned fur side out: Fox, lynx, fisher, wolf, marten, wolverine and wild cat. Leave the others, which are cased, pelt side out.

To case a skin, cut from the root of the tail down the inside of each hind leg to the foot. Then pull the skin carefully over the body and head. The tail should be skinned and the bone removed except for muskrat and opossum. These two can be cut off as they are worthless. Skinning is made easier by suspending the carcass from something, doing this by means of a strong cord tied around the hind legs. Draw the skin from the front legs. Cut off the ears—downward toward the head. Carefully cut the skin loose about the nose and eyes.

In using the open method, cut from the point of the jaw right down the belly to the vent, also down the back of the hind legs and the inside of the front legs. Lynx, mountain lion, bears—which are valuable for rugs or mounting—should be skinned on the legs clear to the toes, leaving the claws attached. Smaller animals, valuable only as furs, may have the legs cut off.

Be sure to clean every bit of flesh and fat from the skins, using extreme care to avoid cutting.

Steel stretchers, which can be had in just the right shape for different skins, give the best results. If you cannot obtain these and do not know from experience the shape and size to make board stretchers, by all means write to one of the big fur houses for information. Improper stretching greatly reduces the value of a skin.

When the skins are on the stretchers, put them in a cool, dry place—never in the sun or near a fire—and keep flies away from them. Dry them just enough to prevent shrinking and wrinkling. If you find that a skin has become too dry to turn, soften a little with a damp cloth. Be sure to let the dampened spots dry out before shipping.

Do not use patented preparations for curing—just the natural drying.

This matter of preparing skins is extremely important and it will mean many more dollars in your pocket to secure some trapping book which goes into full detail about it. Many fur houses issue free books on the subject. They are interested in getting furs in perfect condition and will be glad to tell you how.

A good supply of stretchers should be obtained in advance of trapping season. These stretchers should be of various sizes according to the kind of animals you are trapping for.

Home-made stretchers may be made in a number of ways. No matter what type is used, the boards should be first planed smooth so that the furs may be removed easily when they are dry.

The most common type of board is the straight, blunt-end board, tapering somewhat at one end. One of the types is the three-piece stretcher. The pieces are arranged so that the insertion of the center piece spreads the sides and stretches the pelt.

In lieu of any better material, a good stretcher may be made from a limber pole with struts between. When the straight board stretcher is used, long, slender wedges may be used to stretch the pelt.

Coon skins should be stretched as square as possible. This is accomplished by tacking the skin to a wooden frame. Beaver skins may be stretched on a hoop by sewing with a needle and heavy thread, such skins being round when properly stretched.

When Shipping Furs Make Bundles Secure

Don't put your furs into a sack that is full of holes; neither tie up the end of a good sack and think you have made a secure bundle, for you have really done just the reverse—you have simply invited some dishonest fellow to help himself to your furs and if he accepts the invitation there is no one to blame but yourself. Remember that a great many different people handle your shipments before they reach the market and if you want people to keep their fingers out of your furs, you should make your bundles secure. All bundles of furs (except those sent by parcel post) should be sewed up tight. Parcel post shipments should be properly tied but do not sew up as that prevents inspection of contents by P. O. Dept.

Trapping Methods

A few special tree traps are valuable additions to every trapper's equipment. They are good for catching marten, coon and other tree-climbing animals. They are set on the side of a tree, well above the ground, and are ideal in the north country as they do not snow under. The animal is generally caught by the neck and instantly killed so there is little chance of its escaping.

Mr. Skunk Has Entered Society

For many hundred years the skunk has been one of the most despised and feared animals that roamed the woods, but no more. You will see him in all of the cities of this country and Europe proudly exhibited by his mistress in the street cars, automobiles, theaters, operas, picture shows; in fact, everywhere you see fashionably dressed women.

There is no more beautiful fur than the lovely, silky black skunk. The name is not beautiful and has long been connected with things unpleasant, but this is also changed. In Europe the fur has been sold for years under its rightful name, but in America our mothers, wives, sweethearts and daughters would promptly elevate their noses at the mere mention of its name so it was necessary to re-christen Mr. Skunk after he had been skinned. This was when the skins sold at from 25 cents to $1.00 and were considered a cheap fur.

But in the past few seasons, since the skins have sold readily at from $3.00 to $6.00 and even as high as $10.00, Milady is glad to show her set of skunk furs to her probably less fortunate neighbors.

The trapper is the one that reaps the real benefit from this change and real big money is coming to him for his skunk skins again this year.

There is a great demand for these skins and it is up to the men that can follow the trap-line to get busy.

The skunk is a very easy animal to trap and there are numerous methods of catching him. They are entirely too lazy to build dens of their own, so usually take possession of already built dens, hollow logs, etc. When you can find their dens, it is only necessary to set your trap at the entrance, baited with tainted meat of any kind, cover your trap very lightly and you will get him. The smoke torpedo can be successfully used in driving skunk out of their dens during severe cold weather. Where dens cannot be found, make some by digging a hole under a stump, rock or something of that kind and place your trap right in front of the entrance.

Mr. Skunk is easy to get and his fur easy to sell, which makes him well worth while to the trapper.

The Trapper's Progress

Of late years the trapping industry has evolved from the makeshift, haphazard game of former times into the great stabilized industry of today. Where trappers were formerly numbered by thousands, they are now counted by the hundreds of thousands.

Where formerly the annual catch of pelts was in the hundreds of thousands, it is now in the tens of millions. All furs have increased tremendously in value.

The trapper, too, has undergone a decided change. He takes his work more seriously because he knows his own returns depend on how efficiently he conducts his trapping. His rewards are greater, and his efforts must be properly directed to bring him greater returns.

Hence he has reduced the business of trapping to an efficient, practical basis. Just as it takes time for the skilled workman to acquire mastery of his trade, the professional trapper is not made over night.

Trapping is not difficult but it requires earnest study and application to become expert at it. Thus the modern trapper knows when to trap, how to prepare for trapping and the habits of the different fur-bearing animals.

The men who bring in the biggest catches explain their success by just such painstaking methods. Every month of the year they are thinking of trapping and looking out for their profits.

This is the time for preparation for the coming trapping season, and preparation is one of the most important parts of trapping. How many furs a trapper will take in the course of the season depends on proper preparation. Trapping is distinct from preparation—there is the proper time for each. If the work of preparation takes up part of the time that should be devoted to trapping, the trapper loses.

The expert trappers, the men who know, are getting ready now. They are going over their outfits, inspecting their territory, looking for tracks and signs, getting new supplies and attending to all the other operations that are necessary. When the season opens they will be equipped to go into the field with greatest as-

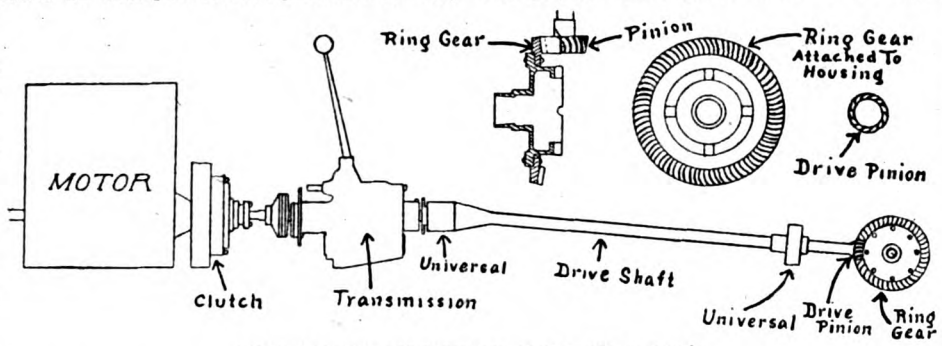
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps



Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Battery Discharges—Cut-Out at Fault

A NEIGHBOR of mine attempted to start his car in the morning only to find that the storage battery had absolutely discharged. He took his battery to a service station and rented a service battery while his was being charged. Much to his surprise the service battery soon became fully discharged, after which he started to inspect the electrical system. All wires appeared to be well insulated and the connections tight. Finally he removed the cover from the automatic cut-out and then found that the automatic feature had failed to perform as intended. Instead he found that the contact points were stuck together, thereby allowing the battery to discharge back through the generator when the engine was stopped. Of course this condition was evident on the ammeter which would show a heavy discharge when the motor was stopped and all lights switched off. However, he never gave a thought to noticing the ammeter when switching off the ignition and consequently the battery was allowed to discharge. Although the cut-out is a portion of the electrical system which gives but little trouble, it is always well to notice the ammeter before leaving the car. Sometimes a sticking cut-out can be remedied by pulling the points apart and cleaning and smoothing the surfaces. On the other hand, a new cut-out may be needed. The purpose of the cut-out is to break the points apart when the generator stops, thereby opening the circuit so that the battery will not charge back and become exhausted.

The Underpan

At this season the motor is liable to backfire frequently when first started and it is therefore well to take precautions against the starting of a fire. Under the majority of motors will be found an underpan commonly termed the drip-pan. This pan catches oil, gasolene, water, dirt and in fact quite a large assortment of things. Should the oily matter in this pan catch fire a large blaze is assured. It is good policy to occasionally remove this pan and clean it carefully. When fire catches in the drip-pan, it might be said that the motor is in the frying-pan, and unless a suitable extinguisher is at hand a considerable damage will be done.

THIS DIAGRAM ILLUSTRATES FINAL DRIVE RATIO.

Safe Driving

Some dangerous driving is done at slow speeds while some safe driving is done at fairly fast rates of speed. I recently made a 200-mile trip on a bus running between two large Middle Western cities. The driver of this car at times reached speeds around the 50-miles-an-hour point, yet I felt perfectly safe at all times. The driver gave undivided attention to the road. He was always alert and attended strictly to the business of driving. Another type of driver will never exceed the 25-mile limit, yet he is a menace to the highways because he does not give his full attention to driving. He will gaze off into fields, store windows, etc., for 30 seconds to a minute at a stretch, fully unconscious as to where he is guiding the car. I recently witnessed a slight accident where a driver of a car ran into the rear of another car due to the fact that he was much more interested in the conversation with a passenger than he was in his driving.

Helpful Pointers

Firing Order

A four-cylinder motor has two possible firing orders, viz., 1-2-4-3 and 1-3-4-2. In case the owner does not know the firing order of his four-cylinder motor and should desire to determine it he should proceed as follows:

Using the hand crank, turn over the motor slowly until the intake valve for No 1 cylinder opens. Continue to turn the motor until the valve closes and then take notice whether the intake valve for the No. 2 or No. 3 cylinder is the next to open. If the No. 2 intake valve opens after No. 1 then the firing order is 1-2-4-3, but if No. 3 intake valve opens after No. 1 then the motor will fire 1-3-4-2. The principle is that the No. 2 piston must draw in gas while No. 1 compresses and No. 2 must compress while No. 1 fires in order to fire 1-2-4-3. On the other hand, if the firing order was 1-3-4-2, the No. 3 intake valve would open after No. 1 as this cylinder must suction while No. 1 compresses, and No. 3 would compress while No. 1 fired.

Cylinder Head Types

A motor is said to be of the T head type when the intake valves are on one side of the cylinders and the exhaust valves on the other side.

The L head type has all valves (intake and exhaust) on the same side of the cylinders.

A motor is classified as the I head type when the exhaust and intake valves are placed in the head.

Some motors have the intake valve in the head and the exhaust valve on the side of the cylinder. There seems to be a difference in opinion as to how this motor should be classed. Some engineers refer to it as a modified L arrangement, others as the L and I head, while there are still others who call it the F head type.

Kerosene for Cooling Radiator

As cold weather approaches, the owner's thought naturally runs towards using a fluid in the cooling system which will not freeze. Frequently I hear of people using kerosene for this purpose. While kerosene will not freeze, there are several objections against its adoption for this purpose. First, it gives off a disagreeable odor and causes a greasy film to be deposited on the car. Next, it has a low vaporization point and will readily cause overheating on mild days. Kerosene also attacks the rubber hose connections, causing leaks, etc.

Motor Knocks

Several conditions are possible with a motor which would produce knocks of different sounds. The experienced mechanic soon recognizes the different sounds so that he becomes almost certain which part or assembly needs adjustment.

A carbon knock is very pronounced and is comparable to the sound produced by striking a piece of steel with a small hammer. This knock usually becomes noticeable when operating on upgrades or upon sudden opening of the throttle.

When the lower bearing of a connecting rod becomes loose it will produce a knock that is distinct when running the motor at an idling speed or upon sudden closing of the throttle when the motor is operating at a fairly fast rate of speed. The sound is dull yet very distinct.

Carrying the spark too far advanced causes combustion to take place in the cylinders too early and the sound is comparable to heavy pounding.

A loose-fitting piston slaps against the sides of the cylinder walls and causes a rattle. Quick acceleration will cause a piston to slap if it is loose.

Warning Signs

During my trip East I was much interested in signs painted in large block letters on the pavement of some cities. Two of which I remember well, which reminded the driver to drive slowly, are "Drive slowly and see our city, drive fast and see our judge." "Do your darndest, we only charge $1 per mile."

Final Drive Ratio

In all stock cars when operating on high gear, the engine turns over three, four or sometimes five times to the rear wheels once. The expression "direct drive" on high is frequently heard but this does not mean that the rear wheels revolve once for each turn over of the engine. It does mean that the gear ratios in the transmission are not used and that the engine is directly coupled to the rear axle. The difference in revolutions between the engine and rear wheels is obtained by using rear axle gears (drive pinion and ring gear) having different number of teeth. For example, the drive pinion is driven at engine speed or, in other words, makes the same number of revolutions as the engine. If the drive pinion has 18 teeth and the ring gear 54 teeth it is but a simple matter of mathematics to understand that the pinion must revolve three times in order to turn the ring gear one complete revolution. This ratio would be three to one on high. If the pinion had 12 teeth and the ring gear 60 teeth then the pinion would make five complete turns to each revolution of the ring gear and the ratio would be five to one. In like manner, when the number of teeth in the pinion and ring gear are known, it is a simple matter to figure out how many times the engine turns over to each revolution of the rear wheels when operating on direct drive which is usually "high gear."

Backing Out

Don't be in too big a hurry when backing the car out of the garage, especially if there are youngsters around. It is only natural for a little tot to run behind or near the car when the garage doors are open and inasmuch as the driver cannot see directly behind the car, there is danger of knocking the tot down or running over him. It is always time well spent to look around and under the car before backing it out.

Misfiring

When the motor suddenly misfires, the driver should first determine whether the miss is regular or intermittent. If regular, it is probable that a spark-plug has sooted or broken. There is also a chance that a valve has stuck open or a high-tension wire becoming disconnected at the plug or distributor. However, the most common cause is a defective spark-plug.

If the misfiring is intermittent the trouble might be due to a spark-plug that does not fire at all times or to a valve that has a tendency to occasionally stick open. A loose wiring connection will also cause an intermittent miss.

If a valve sticks in its guide kerosene squirted down the stem will usually loosen the gummed substance that is causing the trouble.

Essentials

When the car stops dead on the road, remember that there are two essentials to its operation: First, the motor must have gasolene; second, there must be a spark in each cylinder to fire the charges.

Speed Duty

From time to time inquiries have been received relative to obtaining speed from cars that have been converted into racy types. The Ford car seems to be very popular with owners who desire to bring about this end. The standard rear axle ratio for this make of car is three and seven-elevenths to one. For use on the roads in a section of the country that is not hilly a three to one ratio will usually give the desired result. This ratio should place the owner in the 50-mile-an-hour class with throttle wide open. Again, there are owners who desire to place their made-over mounts on the dirt tracks, for which there is the two and three-fourths to one ratio. This ratio should produce all the thrills sought.

Owners who contemplate racing should not be disillusioned by believing that a change in gear ratio will make their mounts ready for racing action. In order to obtain endurance the pistons should be given increased clearance, the oiling system altered and it has become common practice to install a cylinder head with 16 valves. There are several matters which would need attention before the car could be expected to stand up in racing service; but for those who desire the occasional burst of speed on the road the change in gear ratio will work wonders. There are several accessory houses advertising different gear ratios for this make of car.

We Are Right

In this country and Canada all traffic keeps to the right-hand side of the road. In England all traffic keeps to the left.

Answers to Correspondents

FORD PISTON RINGS.—Please answer the following questions: (1) What is the proper clearance of Ford piston rings? (2) Does it make any difference which side up a ring is put in, and if so will it pump oil if wrong side up? (3) What could cause one rear wheel of my 1914 model Ford to stop turning for a couple of seconds and then go again? I was running in high gear when this happened, and a few days later the hub twisted off. Was that the cause? (4) Are the Ford cylinders the same size top and bottom?

W. V. Jr., Judson, N. Dak.

A.—I am informed by a person who specializes on repair work for cars of your make that the top ring should have a gap clearance of .004 to .008 inch, the center ring approximately .012 inch and the bottom oil ring about .016 inch. This is measured by first placing the piston without rings in the cylinder. A ring is then pushed into the cylinder and the piston pulled back so that it forces the ring into a true position in the cylinder. A thickness gauge is then used to measure the gap. Yes, it is possible to install a standard Ford ring so that it will not give the proper results. For example, the Ford ring is produced with a taper of approximately .002 so that the ring bears on its lower edge and scrapes back any excess oil. You will realize that were the rings installed in the wrong direction there would be a tendency for them to pump oil up into the cylinders rather than away from them. If you will examine the ring closely, believe you will notice a punch mark on the top edge on the inside. This mark indicates which is the proper side of the ring to have up. If I remember correctly, the earlier type rings had a mark resembling one made by a file. The Ford cylinder has a three and three-fourths inch bore. It is beyond me to explain the cause for the locking of one rear wheel without having the opportunity to inspect your car. If I understand the condition properly, your car was running along smoothly when suddenly one of your rear wheels locked tightly. If I have the proper understanding, then I would suggest removal of the rear axle and examination of the differential to determine if there was any derangement at that point.

ENGINE KNOCKS IN HIGH GEAR.—My 1920 model Ford, which has been run about 2,500 miles, has developed an engine knock when going up grade in high. Kindly tell me the cause of the trouble.

R. M. D., Evansville, Ark.

A.—I would suggest removal of the cylinder head and cleaning the carbon from head and pistons. Carbon knocks are pronounced when operating on grades or upon sudden opening of throttle. Usually retarding the spark will eliminate the knock.

The Egg Organs

I AM asked so frequently why hens lay soft-shelled eggs with blood specks in them, eggs that are odd shaped, etc., that I am going to give our readers an explanation of the formation and process of producing eggs, and some of the causes of the abnormal results which surprise amateur poultry keepers from time to time.

Anyone, upon opening after death the body of a hen, will find a cluster of eggs in formation much like a bunch of grapes, and called the ovarium. These, however, are but rudimentary eggs, and are in size from a pinhead to the full-sized yolk of an egg. Each of these eggs is contained within a thin transparent sac and attached by a narrow pipe or stem to the ovary, and during the laying period of the hen these eggs are maturing and thus keeping up the supply of eggs which she lays.

These rudimentary eggs have neither shell nor white, consisting wholly of yolk, on which floats the germ of the future chicken, and as they become larger they arrive at a certain stage when, by their own volition, weight or other cause, they become detached from the bunch and fall into a sort of funnel leading to a passage called the oviduct, this organ in the hen being from 22 to 26 inches long.

During the passage of the egg or ovum to the outer world, it becomes coated with successive layers of albumen—the white—which is secreted from the blood vessels of the oviduct in the form of a thick, glairy fluid, and is prevented from mixing with the yolk by the membrane or sac which surrounded it before it became detached from the cluster. It is also strengthened by a second and stronger membrane, formed around the first immediately after falling into the funnel, and having what is like two twisted cords, of a more dense albuminous character, called by anatomists chalazes, which pass quite through the white at the ends, and being, as it were, embedded therein, thus preventing the yolk and germ from rolling about when the egg is moved, and serving to keep the germ so that it may best receive the heat imparted during incubation.

It is during the passing of the egg through the lower portion of the oviduct that it gets covered with the two skins which are found inside the shell. These, although lying close around the egg, at the thick end become separate, and form what is called the air bubble or chamber. This, in newly-laid eggs, is a mere speck, and is that portion which shows the results of the evaporation previously referred to. This speck of air space becomes daily larger as the egg becomes older, and is frequently equal to one-quarter of the entire egg. This egg chamber, if perforated with the finest needle, will prevent the egg from hatching.

When the egg is advanced more than half way down the oviduct, it is still destitute of a shell, which begins to be formed by a process of secretion, and, when about completed, the various shades of brown and tinted coloring matter are imparted in those breeds in which colored eggs are peculiar. When the shell and coloring are complete, the egg continues to advance along the oviduct, till the hen goes to the nest and lays it.

Eggs are produced from the surplus food, which is that over and above what is required for the sustenance of the hen, and if such is too stimulating, or given in excess quantities, the result is that in the former case the ova are produced so rapidly that sometimes two of them drop into the oviduct together, which results in the eccentricities which frequently puzzle the poultry keeper. These ova travel along together through the passage and receive the white separately, but become enveloped in one shell, and when laid are commonly known as double-yolked eggs, but more properly it is a double egg, the white being duplicated as well as the yolk. Should these yolks be fertilized and the egg hatched, we get the occasional four-legged or other chicken monstrosity.

A further result of stimulating food is varied from the above when the ova mature in excess in one day. In place of falling into the passage in pairs, as above, the two drop in separately, but on the same day. This results in soft eggs, not from the want of shell-forming material but rather because the shells cannot be formed as fast as the mature egg is ready for such covering.

Crooked eggs are no uncommon thing in the poultry yard, and are attributable as follows: Twenty-four hours are usually sufficient for the formation of a perfect shell, but when by stimulation a second ovum falls close on its predecessor, reaching it before laid, the second egg, which up to this time is soft and lying against the hard one, becomes covered with a shell, and when laid presents a flat or crooked side, the result of its position against the hard one.

To overfeeding is also attributable the further irregularity of one perfect egg being found within another, and caused by irritation of the oviduct, which, contracting in front of the perfectly-formed egg, instead of behind it, forces it back until it meets another yolk, when the two join and again become coated with the white and the shell, thus producing another wonder. Other abnormalities are occasionally seen, and particularly in the smaller poultry yards. Sometimes when the ova are nearly exhausted by continuous laying, the secreting organs may be the most active, which results in small marble-sized but perfect-looking eggs, which are merely a shell covering a portion of albumen. Such "eggs," when laid, have the peculiarity of never having been at any stage attached to the ovary, but are a product only of the oviduct.

To the internal fatness of the hen are due other eccentricities than those mentioned, including the apparently paradoxical feat of laying rotten new-laid eggs, this being a not unfrequent occurrence. The egg, being unable to force its way through the fatty oviduct, is retained two or three days near the mouth of this organ, and, if a fertilized one, the heat of the hen's body tends to putrefy it, and when ultimately laid it is in an addled condition. To other causes, but principally diseased organs, is due a departure from normal in the way of color. A hen which lays white or brown eggs, on rare occasions produces one almost black, and in most instances the shells are rough, wavy, corrugated or otherwise irregular. There are instances of foreign matter being found in eggs, clots of blood being nothing unusual. This is the result of the breaking of a blood vessel internally, and again, possibly the result of overfeeding.

Fowls from whatever cause producing any of the above misshapen or otherwise faulty eggs, should at once be got rid of, for although in some cases a reduced diet may bring them back to their normal production, still the slightest cause will frequently prompt the organs to their previous irregularities.

But to return to the ever-in-demand fresh egg. It must be of good size, uniform in color and have a strong shell. To get these qualities, the birds must be all of one variety, for a mixed flock will produce eggs of all shades between white and brown. To be sure of having a good supply during early winter, the hens must have been hatched the preceding spring. Size and weight depend first on the breed; secondly, on the feed and care the birds receive.

In the wholesale market of New York, the white-shelled egg brings the highest price; in Boston the dark-shelled egg is favored, but for the first-class private trade there seems very little distinction, except in the case of people who have traveled much in Europe, and they always prefer the brown shells. So you see locality and the class of customer to which you are likely to cater should decide what breed will be the most profitable. Leghorns and Anconas are the best layers in the white-shelled class; Wyandottes and Orpingtons for the brown shells. They must have good houses and plenty of room, especially in the scratching shed, for hens that are expected to produce eggs during the winter must have a big open-air shed which communicates with the roosting house, so that they can get into the fresh air and exercise without getting their feet wet and cold. The shed should face south, be boarded up at the back and ends, and have a good roof, and the front covered with wire netting, with muslin curtains to be let down during periods of driving rain or snow.

The floor should be covered to a depth of ten or twelve inches with chopped straw or dry leaves. Many people think that anything will do for litter, as it is only for the birds to scratch in, but experienced poultrymen know that musty or moldy scratching material on the floor of the house is a terrible menace, for it harbors germs which are most dangerous to the life of the birds, so always be extremely careful that the litter and hay, or whatever is used in the nest boxes, is dry and sweet and clean, for the shell is porous, and if laid on musty material the flavor is spoiled.

To produce eggs during the winter, when shut into close quarters, hens must have animal and green vegetable food, or they won't produce eggs, no matter how much grain is given them.

Really hard and sharp grit, oystershell and water are just as essential. And remember that oystershell, lime and plaster do not take the place of grit, which is necessary for the digestion and assimilation of grain.

Male birds are not to be allowed with the flock of hens being kept specially for market eggs. The hens produce better without them, and sterile eggs keep much longer, and are much to be preferred for table use.

How many eggs can one expect from a hen? This is a perfectly fair question, and one upon which almost everyone starts his figuring, when thinking about getting a flock of chickens. The average good hen should produce in a year around one hundred eggs. The average production for hens on farms in general is not that much, and on the other hand on good poultry farms it exceeds that figure considerably. But under average conditions one hundred eggs is a fair number to expect from a hen. Put your expectations between ten and twelve dozen, but do not criticize her too severely if she does not go far over a hundred, for the chances will be that she was not to blame. Taking the price of eggs quoted above, for August first or thereabouts, and the value of one egg is over four cents. The retail price at the store for that same egg is nearer five cents or more. One hen ought to give you, if you do your share, nearly from three and a half to five dollars' worth of eggs. Supposing that you figure on ten hens or even twenty? Then for safety's sake figure that three or four of those hens do not prove more than half as good as the others. You still have a lot of eggs to count on.

How much will it cost to keep a hen? Again, a fair question, and one upon the answer to which much depends. Under normal grain prices it usually costs a poultry raiser something in the neighborhood of one dollar and seventy-five cents a year to feed one hen. But it must be remembered that he feeds her with a grain ration and table scraps form but a small portion of the feed item, if they figure in it at all. He must buy the greater part of that grain. For the small flock concerning which this article relates, the use of waste table scraps will cost nothing, and in fact be a saving. Some grain and some mash may be fed with benefit and profit, but the majority of food for such flocks will come from the kitchen. Under such conditions, with even the prevailing high grain prices, the cost of feeding a hen would not come up to the average on a poultry farm. The cost of keeping her, even though it did equal the market value of her eggs, would and should not prohibit her from appearing, for the advantage of having fresh eggs at all times would counterbalance.

Keeping Eggs for Winter Use

First, the egg should be infertile and quite fresh. Don't use eggs from "stolen" nests, or any that you are not sure are positively fresh, and without testing them. Candling is the safest way of testing them. Do this in a darkened room. If you have not a tester lamp, put a common lamp, lantern, electric bulb or any other light into a box. Have a hole in the box smaller than an egg and directly opposite the light. The box should also have a hole at the top to relieve heat and smoke.

Hold the egg with the large end up, close to the lighted hole. If the egg is perfectly fresh and good it will look clear, its yolk but faintly outlined. The air space will be hardly visible, only one-eighth to three-sixteenths of an inch in depth. If this air space is larger, with a movable lower line, it means the egg is stale or becoming watery. Any small, dark spots that may be seen are usually blood clots. If heat or germination has been doing its work, large dark spots, blood rings or shadows will appear. A very dark or black egg with a fixed air space is a fertile one with a well-developed chick. When dark and with a large air space showing a movable lower line it has become that old-time famous political wrapper—a rotten egg.

THE MINORCA LAYS LARGE WHITE EGGS AND PLENTY OF THEM.

Keep the nests clean, and gather eggs twice a day to prevent the shell being soiled. Washing in soapy water is injurious, for it removes the substance which fills the pores of the shell and protects the egg from germs. Should an egg get slightly soiled, cloth dampened with vinegar will remove the stains without injury. But if it is very dirty, don't try to preserve it. It is hardly necessary to say that a cracked egg is not fit for packing.

The question of a container comes next. The best is an earthenware or stone crock or jar. It won't leak or rust or taste—it keeps the eggs in fine condition.

A five-gallon crock will hold fifteen dozen eggs. Clean it thoroughly, scald and dry. Put into it nine quarts of water that has been boiled and cooled. Add one quart of sodium silicate or water-glass, which you can buy at the drug store. Stir well together. Set the eggs carefully in the crock. If you have not enough to fill it at once put them in from time to time. Be sure the solution always covers them by two inches. Cover the crock with a tight lid of waxed paper tied down, and set in a cool dry place.

Carefully selected eggs laid down in this way will keep from six to twelve months. The authorities admit that they are likely to deteriorate a little after the sixth month. We are assured that for that length of time they are good enough to serve in any form. But if you keep them, they will crack because of the expansion of the air within them. To avoid this, puncture the large end with a pin before putting the egg into the water.

Waterglass solution should not be used a second time unless it has kept quite clear and is free from odor and thick sediment.

H. L. L.—Even though you say, "very few seem to have bowel trouble," I am sure the deaths were caused by white diarrhea, and as accounts of heavy loss from this disease have been coming to me from all parts of the country, I am going to answer your letter very fully, feeling sure that a full discussion of the cause and symptoms will help many of our readers.

The earliest deaths may occur within a very short time after hatching, without any prominent symptoms excepting, perhaps, weakness and lack of vitality. The characteristic whitish discharge from the vent soon makes its appearance in the flock, the time depending, without doubt, upon the virulence of the organism and the mode of infection. The discharge may be slight or profuse, in color white or creamy, sometimes mixed with brown. The voided matter has a more or less sticky or glairy character. It may simply streak the down below the vent or may cling to the down in sufficient quantity to seal up the vent. This is the condition that poultrymen designate as "pasting up behind." This latter condition, however, is not necessarily indicative of white diarrhea.

The chicks soon become listless and sleepy, inclined to huddle together and remain under the hover most of the time. They seem to lose appetite and do not eat much. Frequently when they attempt to take food their action is more or less mechanical. The wings begin to droop or project slightly from the body, feathers ruffled. In acute cases the eyes are closed and the chicks become indifferent to everything that goes on about them. Many of the chicks peep or chirp constantly, the sound being shrill or weak according to the strength of the individual. Frequently when endeavoring to void the excreta the chicks utter a shrill twitter, apparently a cry of pain. The breathing may be labored, the abdomen heaving with each breath. Occasionally one may note a certain amount of gasping or gaping.

During the progress of the disease the chick may die suddenly while still fairly strong. When the disease is prolonged the chicks gradually waste away, becoming weaker and weaker until they are scarcely able to support their own weight. In this stage they will often be seen to rest against foreign objects for support, standing with legs braced apart, squatting or lying utterly helpless.

Frequently the chicks take on the appearance which poultrymen call "short backed." The backs seem to shorten and the abdomen to protrude out of proportion, causing the chicks to look "stilty," as compared with one of normal development. This condition Wood accurately describes as follows:

"The weakling is almost always big bellied, the abdomen protruding to the rear so that it bunches out behind, well out of line with the vent, with the result that the chick looks as if the tail-piece and back-bone had been pushed forward and in just above the vent."

With few exceptions, the deaths from typical bacillary white diarrhea occur while the chicks are under one month of age. After this a few straggling deaths may be expected, and if complications set in, a high mortality may be observed. The chicks which have had bacillary white diarrhea seem to be greatly weakened in constitution, and fall an easy prey to disorders which would be resisted easily by normal chicks.

Those which survive remain more or less stunted in their development. Frequently they are misshapen, with long beaks and "crow heads" and with imperfect feathering. In every way they impress one as being weak and lacking in vitality. This condition may persist indefinitely, or the bird may slowly regain vigor and vitality and finally make satisfactory development.

Cold November Days

NOVEMBER, the changeable month that bridges the gap between Indian summer and hoary old winter, finds garden operations fairly well completed for the year, and the garden tools stored away for spring use. At any rate, we hope that they are carefully put away in the tool house or machine shed, but so often do we see them left outdoors to rust and depreciate in value that we can't say for certain. By the way, how about the spades, shovels, hoes and hand cultivator? Yes, and the plow too, for that matter? Have all of these received a thorough coating of axle grease or vaseline to keep them from rusting, and have all of the working parts been well oiled against their efficient service next spring? A rusted plow or shovel that refuses to "scour" is a time-wasting, cuss-provoking proof of neglect that there is no excuse for. A little grease saves a lot of wasted time and regrets. But, while we think of it, do not do as one gardener in our acquaintance did. His intentions were of the finest, but he used some old grease and bacon "fryings" from the kitchen. Imagine his dismay in the spring when he found that every tool from the plow down to the trowel was evenly coated with thick rust. Couldn't figure it out for a long time, either, until he recalled that until cold weather came on the watchdog slept in the machine shed. Is it not quite likely that the dog, with a fine nose and an appreciative taste for tasty drippings, licked off every bit of grease that had been applied? But we have yet to see a dog with a taste for axle grease. Use it instead.

About mulching: Most farmers know how to cover their strawberries with straw, waiting until the ground is slightly frozen, then putting on a thin covering that will not stimulate winter growth to the detriment of the plants. Most know, also that asparagus and rhubarb should be protected. Perhaps they even help the "missus" by covering the bulb beds and the rosebushes with manure and straw to guarantee that the early bloomers and the summer brighteners live through winter. But how many give their blackberry, raspberry and other bushes any protection? This is best done in cold regions, especially where there are cold and dry winter winds, by gently bending down the plants all one way lengthwise of the row, then covering with a few inches of earth. In larger patches, to save labor, this may be done by plowing a furrow over the row from one side and then completing the covering job with a shovel where necessary. In early spring, as soon as the frost is out of the ground, uncover the plants again and straighten up the canes. They will reward you well for the attention.

The young orchard should come in for more attention than it sometimes receives. Isn't it rather remarkable that young apple, cherry or other trees receive considerable care, such as spraying, insect protection, and even watering in dry weather throughout their first summer, then are left to "shift for themselves" with the arrival of cold weather? Then, in truth, is the time that they need a little care, for they are too often the prey of rodents because their bark is thin and appetizing. Furthermore, as many orchardists have learned to their sorrow, such ravages are seldom noticed in time to prevent them; in the spring, when the snow melts, is the time the damage comes to light. But in late fall just before heavy snows is the time to take veneer board or tarred paper, make cylinders around each small trunk, and wire into place. This simple treatment is sure protection from everything from the bark-hungry bunny down to the smallest mouse that ever burrowed under the snow to girdle valuable young nursery stock. Just another illustration of the good old saying that has it, "An ounce of prevention is worth many pounds of cure."

Correct Use of Fertilizers

With many farmers and gardeners the use of commercial fertilizers is largely a matter of guesswork, so far as the food requirements of specific crops and the amount of fertilizer required to supply the same are concerned.

In deciding upon the amount of fertilizer to be applied to an acre, the probable increase in yield and the market value of the resulting crop must be taken into consideration. Garden crops as a rule bring higher returns than field crops; therefore they merit a greater outlay for fertilizers. Most vegetables make rapid growth, which indicates that their fertilizer requirements are extensive, but as a rule they respond quickly to heavy applications of barnyard manure.

When the gardener is compelled to depend mainly or entirely upon commercial fertilizers, he should use from 500 to 1,500 pounds per acre of a good 4-8-5 or perhaps 4-8-6 fertilizer. That is to say, one that contains four per cent. nitrogen, eight per cent. phosphoric acid, and either five or six per cent. potash. For a very leafy crop the nitrogen content should be increased; this may be done by employing manure or some leguminous crop, however. For a root crop the nitrogen content can be reduced, and correspondingly more phosphoric acid employed. Many successful market gardeners use very heavy applications of barnyard manure, at times as much as 20 tons per acre, and in addition supplement this with some fertilizer that is rich in phosphoric acid.

When fertilizers are used in small amounts primarily for the purpose of giving young plants a quick start, the fertilizer should be applied close to the plants, and quickly available material should be used as a top dressing. Applications of nitrogen in the form of nitrate of soda, applied in early spring to young plants, help the plants by forcing growth, producing greater thrift, and tiding over the lean time until warmer weather comes. Small applications of phosphoric acid to winter wheat or rye at seeding time stimulate growth and strength, thus enabling the better established plants to better withstand the rigors of cold winter weather.

Just a word about tags, which are required by law, on fertilizer bags: These tags are often a bit misleading to one not "posted" on their true meaning, particularly since they contain so many figures and so much meaningless and unnecessary information that the essential items are concealed. First, ignore everything that appears in the second or right-hand column; this is simply the possible maximum content. The left-hand row of figures gives the guaranteed content, and that is what the farmer wants to know. Furthermore, he is concerned only with the amount of available nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash contained. Therefore the figures giving the guaranteed amounts of these three elements should receive his attention, to the entire exclusion of all else, which is, in the main, a mere repetition or combination of the same information. Do this, and you will not be misled or deceived: Read the guaranteed amount of nitrogen; the amount of available phosphoric acid; the actual amount of potash. See that these figures, when grouped, give the ratio desired. For example, if a 4-8-6 fertilizer is wanted, the quantities (percentages) of these ingredients present should read somewhat as follows: Nitrogen, 4.12; available phosphoric acid, 8.35; potash (actual), 6.07. Perhaps they will all run still higher, but if they fall below the 4-8-6 requirement don't let this discrepancy be hidden from you in the long list of fine sounding but comparatively unimportant figures.

Beekeepers Please Note

"The loss of heat is most rapid through the bottom of all the insulated hives tested," says Circular No. 222, of the United States Department of Agriculture.

This, it will be noted, is quite contrary to the usual belief put into practice by beekeepers that "heat rises." For this mistaken reason they seldom insulate or pack the bottoms of their hives when making them ready for wintering out of doors, then wonder why they do not carry their swarms over until spring successfully. Nor is it only the beekeepers themselves who make this mistake. The insulated hives upon the market are equally faulty in this regard, and any apiarist who has purchased them should immediately take steps to offset the shortcoming in this direction.

These tests also proved that it is a grave mistake in cold regions to leave any portion of the hive without good insulation. For instance, many apiarists leave not only the bottom of their hives uninsulated, but they leave the fronts which face the south unpacked also. Their theory is that the south or "sunny" side will be benefited by the warm rays of the sun. The truth of the matter is that such a large area of uninsulated surface permits the heat to escape readily, and damage is certain to be the consequence.

The tests further proved that the hives used are not satisfactory for wintering colonies of bees out of doors in the North, and that such claims as have been made for them in this regard are unfounded. These hives, however, serve well for cellar wintering or for outdoor wintering in the warmer South. In regions of cold Northern winters it was found that a covering of sawdust is most satisfactory; furthermore that, since sawdust is quite inexpensive, it is best to pack a space of from four to six inches, rather than to depend upon only one or two inches of the same material.

Gullies Cause Needless Waste

Gullies are a common and unsightly proof of waste and erosion that may be seen in every state in the Union. Besides ruining fertile land, they interfere with farming operations, undermine buildings, encroach upon public highways, endanger the life of stock, and often mar the beauty and lower the market value of a farm. They are largely responsible for the filling up of reservoirs, streams and dredged drainage ditches and for the covering of bottom lands with deposits of sand.

If gullies could not be prevented or even "cured," we would feel that our sympathy should go to farmers upon whose farms they are constantly causing more and more damage as the years pass. But they can be prevented and eventually filled up by correct and timely attention, and failure to do so is a plain indication of shortsightedness upon the part of the owner.

How can this be done? In a number of ways, all of which have been extensively used to meet certain sets of local conditions. In general, the underlying idea is to increase the absorptive capacity of the soil, protecting the surface from erosion, and conducting the surplus water from the field at a low velocity. Fast running water only can cause gullies to form. Gullies can be reclaimed by plowing in and seeding to grass or to timber, or by building soil-saving dams that check erosion and cause the filling of the gully with silt carried by water running down hill.

In general, as is usually the case, prevention is easier than cure. Gullies sometimes come from running rows of cultivated crops up and down hillsides; they should be run at right angles to the slope. Even a loaded wagon hauled over a hillside while the ground is soft may leave tracks or ruts that serve as channels for running water, and in time these grow into deep gullies that steadily encroach upon valuable farm lands.

Where gullies have started, the object of all work is to slow down the current of water which runs into and down them. This is best done by constructing some sort of dam or dams at intervals from the top to the bottom. For this purpose a wide range of materials may be used. Stakes driven across the gully in single or double rows, and having brush piled on the up-hill side or woven between them, then held down securely by stones, will quickly cause filling in of the gully itself. Even corn-stalks or straw piled into gullies and weighted or staked down will give good results. Woven wire fencing in short sections across steep gullies is coming into use, due to good results obtained. Stones and boulders collected in stony land can be skidded with a stone boat to gullies and dumped there to block the fast flowing water as it eats into the land. Concrete dams are perhaps the best solution where large scale damage is under way, but their construction is somewhat more complicated than any farmer will choose to undertake without careful instruction. Those who have need of such information can well afford to send to the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for Farmers' Bulletin No. 1234.

Forcing Vegetables in Cellar

Several of the common garden vegetables can be grown out of season in the cellar. Among these are asparagus, rhubarb, cauliflower, sea-kale and dandelion. The latter is seldom included in the list of garden vegetables; call it a weed if you wish, but remember that it makes fine, tasty greens, and that in the long, cold winter we always relish greens with ham or spareribs.

It is easy to start any of these by simply digging them out of the garden before freeze-up, or by securing the roots from seed stores. In "cellar farming" rhubarb, split the clumps, leaving one-half in the ground as "seed" for next year's crop. The other half should be allowed to freeze solid out of doors, then should be planted in a box of earth in the cellar. Water sufficiently to keep the roots growing steadily, and keep in a dark place. Do not attempt to force the crop for use until after the first of the year, as it will be much easier to manage after that time.

Asparagus may be forced at any time during the winter, and freezing is unnecessary in preparing it for planting in the box in the cellar. Use only asparagus crowns that are three years old at least, and take only a part of each crown, leaving the remainder in the ground as a nucleus for next season's crop. Dandelions, sea-kale, leeks and even Brussels sprouts may be successfully wool. The attractive little hat will be becoming to the average woman on account of its simplicity and the possibility of being able to wear it different ways.

The embroidery on both the band of this and the scarf ends is of the simplest stitches. the brown wool being used to darn it, the background, the copper for the long running stitches on the edge and the blue chenille for the scrolls. The tassels which finish the ends are a combination of the three colors.

The scarf, which is 12x60 inches, is lined throughout with blue silk matching the chenille.

The hat is a three-ineh embroidered band stretched over a buckram foundation, with a tam-o'-shanter crown measuring 14-16 inches.

Effective Scarf Set

Old blue and grey form a partnership which works up charmingly as shown in Fig. 7. For this one may use any soft wool material, one and one-half by one-half yards being needed for the scarf. One ball each of blue brush wool and grey silk mixture.

Turn narrow hems and buttonhole edges of scarf with blue, run three shirrings in each end, an inch apart, and draw up to about six inches.

With blue wool work 1 d c, ch 1, 1 d c, ch 1 across end, turn with ch 4, 1 d c on each d c with ch 1 between. Repeat, making 10 rows.

Flowers of Grey Wool

Ch 4, join 1 s c, 3 d c, 1 s c, repeat four times in ring, ch 10. Two more flowers, finishing with chs 15 and 20. Arrange as shown. Fringe is of blue and grey wool, five and one-half inches deep.

The hat is of blue brush wool, made the same as Fig. 2, only with deeper unwired roll brim. Side trim is of three grey flowers same as on scarf.

Knitted Set

Materials, three balls camel's-hair yarn, two brown silk mixture, one pair No. 5 needles, one amber crochet hook.

With tan yarn cast 50 stitches on needles. K six inches, one rib (2 rows) brown, one rib tan, repeat until 11 or more brown ribs are completed.

Join in tan, K until scarf measures 32 inches before repeating border. Finish with five-inch fringe.

Round Hat

Divide one ball brown and wind into two balls. The crown is crocheted by working singles over two strands of brown wool.

With undivided ball of brown, begin by ch 3, join in ring. Hold two strands close to ring and work 8 s c in ring.

2nd row—Over the two strands work 2 s c, working under two loops of each stitch.

3rd row—2 s c in 1st st, 1 s c in each next 2 sts, 2 s c in 4th st, repeat.

4th row—Increase in every 4th st.

Now increase only six times in each round and never in the same place, gradually bowing the crown in, or making it bowl shaped.

When it measures eight inches in diameter, work without increasing. In last few rows draw strands in to make head size measure about 23 inches or the right size. This should be small, however, as these woolen hats all stretch with wear.

The brim is knitted of the tan yarn, the upper edge finished with a few ribs of brown to match the scarf. This is made in one piece and neatly joined. To find number of stitches required, count stitches in scarf to an inch; if five or six, multiply size of crown by this number. For example: a 23-inch crown, five stitches to inch gives 115 stitches to be cast on for brim.

Card Table Cover

An attractive cover is sure to prove a suitable gift for any friend who enjoys a social game of bridge.

A yard of black sateen or a square of unbleached cloth may be used as one prefers. The black, bound with a narrow gold braid, with black tassels at the corners, makes a very handsome cloth.

The spots, a heart, diamond, spade and club, are of red sateen appliqued neatly one in each corner as shown.

If unbleached is used, these decorations may be solidly cross-stitched, and an initial or monogram in cross-stitching added to the center of the cloth. Roll the edge and overcast all around, then reverse, working in the opposite direction.

Cloths are both square or have cut corners measuring 12 inches, but in either case tapes are at each side of the corners as shown in the illustration, to tie around the table legs to keep the cloth smooth and prevent slipping.

Card cases neatly made are also simple little gifts which cost but a trifle. They may be made up to match a cover, or of chamois which is especially suitable for the purpose and will stand wear. The double case measures 6½x14½ inches. Outline the symbols first, then form the pockets by either binding or cross-stitching the edges together.

The single case is made the right size for one packet of cards, in similar fashion to the one described, with the exception of the flap which extends half way over the front and buttons down.

For either case, black, dark blue or red is desirable on a chamois or unbleached background and red on a black satin case.

simplest stitches, or an applique cut from cretonne or silk, supply just the needed amount of decoration.

A restful pillow, effective in its simplicity, is shown in the square model, No. 3. Soft tan poplin or any plain material, banded off with dull gold braid, is exceedingly rich in appearance and not expensive.

This idea is a very good one for easily securing a decorative effect without much work. In carrying it out, however, one should remember that it can only be successfully applied to a large pillow (24 or 28 inches) or the bands will come too close together and cut the whole up too much to be attractive.

The wreath surrounding initials or a monogram make the design pleasingly personal.

Fascinating little round gingham pillows, trimmed up with a touch of applique, are also very popular.

A rather small check is pretty, using the prevailing color in plain goods for the back, ruffle and floral decorations.

For a 16-inch pillow one will need a half yard of checked gingham and one and one-half yard of plain. Cut a 16-inch circle of each material, and plan for a five-inch ruffle. Turn edge, baste and buttonhole-stitch this with black mercerized floss.

The edges of the flowers are worked in the same way, the green leaves being invisibly felled down.

Seam the two circles and the ruffle together, leaving a small opening for inserting the pillow which can afterwards be finished by hand.

No. 5 gives but a hint of the beauty of a long roll pillow.

Anyone fortunate enough to possess an old black taffeta skirt may make a really stunning one, with very little expense.

As the covering is fulled, it may be in three pieces, each about 12x50 inches.

If one has bands of anything suitable to cover the seaming, sew the three pieces together and run in a shirring string each side of the seam. Otherwise, join the end pieces over the center piece with inch ruffles. Seam up lengthwise and slip on the pillow. Cover four-inch circles of cardboard with silk, shirr in the ends and sew to the circles. Finish the center of each with a full tassel.

For a filling a square pillow may be simply rolled up and the ends fastened securely.

Wool embroidered butterflies give character to the oblong pillow of tan linene, No. 6. These are filled with shots of brilliant color, which stand out vividly against the wood-brown band of coarse burlap which encircles the center of the pillow. The edges of this band are laid flat and closely covered with buttonholing of soft green wool, while the sides of the pillow are finished with wool buttonholing in brown.

The size is 16x22 inches, the center band being nine inches wide.

No. 7 is an especially dainty white linen boudoir pillow, embroidered with rambler roses and loops of blue ribbon.

The roses are of two shades of pink, the deeper being worked in the center and lighter around it.

These are built up and stand out as is shown in the illustration. The work is simply round and round the stitches, commence overlapping in sort of a continuous outline stitch as illustrated in the detail drawing.

The ribbon may be outlined or worked solidly in over and over (satin) stitch as one prefers.

The silk pillow, No. 8, has a most dignified decoration which is the result of combining bits of silk and velvet into bands of conventional apples and leaves, the whole making a most harmonious effect against the plain silk background.

This idea might be used on a pillow of any size quite as effectively.

For the little leaves one will need a number of two and one-half inch squares. Fold into triangles and run a gathering thread along the two square sides. Draw up and sew in place with the leaves well overlapping each other and running from the center of each side towards the edges of the pillow.

Finish the centers with three bright apples, using three-inch circles of silk, gathered up and filled with cotton batting.

A large French knot placed a bit to the center of each apple is a great addition.

No. 9 illustrates a new and decidedly novel idea for the top of a round pillow. Either silk or cotton goods may be used for the pillow, and fine silk cord or cotton perle No. 3 for the web.

After planning the size of the pillow, cut off 15 or more pieces of cord long enough to more than cross the top. Tie them all together in the center. Next knot each cord to the one before it as close to the center as possible.

An inch from these knots make a round of knots with an extra piece of cord, join the ends of this and cut. Arrange the web now, having some threads nearer to each other than others, as shown. About two inches from the last round make another round of knots. Knot in the balance of the web more or less unevenly to make it more realistic. This can easily be accomplished by twisting a cord around a strand of the web several times after making a knot, so that the next line across will not be directly opposite the last one.

The spider is in outline, the top and bottom of the pillow are laced together with the cord and finished with small tassels.

Many other ideas will suggest themselves in looking over materials which could be utilized, as the fad for appliqued designs gives one a wonderful opportunity to use even the tiniest bits of materials of all kinds.

Wee Baby Girl

BY CLARA MIEHM.

Wee baby girl, we love you so,
You're sweeter than all the flowers that grow,
You gurgle and kick and laugh and coo,
What do you mean, when you say 'agoo'?
Where did you get those sparkling eyes?
They're brighter than any sunshiny skies.
What do you dream, when you smile in your sleep?
When dear little fairies their vigil keep?
Are they weaving for you a wonderful spell?
A happy future where all is well—
Where life is just one perfect song,
And you're happy, dear, as the day is long?

Wee baby girl, very soon you will walk,
Then by and by you'll begin to talk;
And life, which should be one perfect song,
With its worries and cares will come along.
May God keep your heart ever pure and bright
To always do what you know is right,
For there's many a dreary and weary load
As you wander along life's varied road.
If we who love you had our way
You'd grow no older day by day,
But stay, the sweetest thing that trod,
A baby, fresh from the hands of God.

In a Friendly Sort o' Way

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY.

When a man ain't got a cent, and he's feeling kind o' blue
An' the clouds hang dark an' heavy, an' won't let the sunshine through,
It's a great thing, oh, my brethern, for a feller just to lay
His hand upon your shoulder in a friendly sort o' way!

It make a man feel curious, it makes the teardrops start,
An' you sort o' feel a flutter in the region of the heart;
You can look up and meet his eyes; you don't know what to say
When his hand is on your shoulder in a friendly sort o' way.

Oh, the world's a curious compound, with its honey and its gall,
With its cares and bitter crosses, but a good world, after all.
An' a good God must have made it—leastways, that is what I say,
When a hand is on my shoulder in a friendly sort o' way.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

Break, break, break,
On thy cold gray stones, O Sea!
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

O well for the fisherman's boy
That he shouts with his sister at play;
O well for the sailor lad
That he sings in his boat on the bay!

And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill;
But O for the touch of a vanished hand
And the sound of a voice that is still!

At the foot of thy crags, O Sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me.

The Modern Farmer

handled in the cellar, keeping them cool and dark until they are needed, then bringing them out where they will get some sunlight.

Hog Killing Tips

Hog killing day on the farm usually means hustle, hustle, with a lot of things done in a rush that should have been done in advance in preparation for the big fall event. For instance, all the necessary tools can be laid out the day before. These include an eight-inch sticking knife—that, no doubt, will need sharpening; a cleaver, a cutting knife that also may need a good edge, gambrels of a couple of sizes, meat saw, scrapers, sharpening steel, hooks, rope, perhaps a block and tackle, and a meat chopper for the "missus."

A hoisting device will do away with the back-breaking job of handling heavy carcasses as they are lifted and plunged into the scalding vat. A block and tackle attached to an overhead beam, a scraping table made of strong planks set waist high, and a barrel tilted at about a 45-degree angle—these three combine to lift a lot of the burdens of hog killing day. And by all means have a thermometer at hand. It will save a lot of guesswork and labor, too. Keep the water in the scalding barrel as near to 155 degrees as possible, for at this temperature it will do the best work. Cooler water will not loosen the bristles quickly and evenly; water at 160 degrees or over "sets" the bristles and may even cook the skin of young shoats. The result of water that is too hot is a lot more scraping, patchy work, and even skinned or peeled carcasses that are unwelcome at home or on the dressed meat market.

To make the skin of hams and bacons clean and white, throw a handful of wood ashes into the scalding water. This practice also aids in removing the scurf. Keep the carcass agitated throughout the time it is in the scalding barrel. When the hair will come off the legs and flanks easily, it is ready to pull onto the scraping table. In very cold weather it is sometimes best to cover the carcass with wet burlap sacks, uncovering only as scraping proceeds.

Use Care in Opening Silo

Care is always important in opening the silo. First see that all moldy silage—and there always is some on the top, no matter how careful we are—is removed. By this we do not mean that it should be thrown out into the barnyard or upon the manure pile. Put it where it will not serve as a temptation for horses or cattle that will be sure to find it if it is thrown out within their reach. Some farmers save it to scatter in the chicken house, which is perhaps the safest and best plan.

Silage poisoning is particularly common among horses, and is not uncommon among horses that have not been fed silage to the knowledge of their owner. Most of these cases can be traced to old, moldy silage that has been carelessly thrown out of the silo. Good silage has a peculiar acid smell, and the leaves are never decomposed. Beware of silage that has a musty odor, or that contains leaves that are brownish, slimy and easily crushed up into a greasy mass. The chances are that this silage will give trouble. Better waste a little and be on the safe side.

Remember that silage is more loosely packed at the top of the silo than it is as you go further down. For this reason it will spoil more quickly, as the air gets into it with ease. Many farmers keep a few short lengths of heavy plank in the silo until some 10 feet or so have been fed off, the weight of these planks serving to pack the silage between feedings. And while the silage level is still high in the silo is the right time to see that the roof is secure and tight all around. If this is neglected until midwinter a leak or crack is difficult to reach from the inside, and is quite likely to go unmended throughout the year. Of course the condition of the silage suffers as a consequence.

Liquid Spray Beats Dust Spray

In extensive experiments just recently completed in Ohio, spraying was found to give good results as a means of controlling tipburn and hopperburn of potatoes. Work was carried out in nine counties. Out of 53 spraying demonstrations, in which home-made Bordeaux mixture was used, in only two instances did the sprayed plants fail to outyield those untreated. Many of the increases were from 30 to 35 bushels better than those of the unsprayed fields, and in one case the sprayed field yielded at a rate of 82 bushels, or 76 per cent. more than adjoining unsprayed fields. Surprisingly good results were secured with only two or three sprayings, provided the applications were thorough. Dusting results were by no means so satisfactory as those secured with liquid spray.

Of the early varieties, Early Triumph proved to be the most susceptible to hopperburn, even the sprayed rows suffering extensively. For this reason it appears that this variety cannot profitably be raised in seasons when the leaf hoppers are numerous. Early Ohio was quite susceptible, but it gave good results in favor of the spraying. Irish Cobbler was the least susceptible of the early varieties. Of the late varieties, Rural New Yorker showed marked susceptibility, while the Russet Rurals were much more resistant. Varieties of the Green Mountain type seemed to endure the trouble much better, remaining green when other sorts were brown and dead. Fourteen varieties in all were tested, the spraying paying well in all cases except the Early Triumphs.

Common Salt Improves Sugar Beets

Several sets of field and laboratory studies of the influence of common salt on the growth, quality and water utilization of sugar beets as compared with pure sodium chlorid, Glauber salt, sodium nitrate and calcium chlorid have recently been reported by experiment stations.

Common salt, and generally most sodium salts, increased the quantity and quality of the sugar beet crop on both light and heavy soils where only light potash applications had been made and heavy sodium fertilization was practiced. Glauber salt and sodium nitrate gave better results than calcium chlorid. This is taken to indicate that it is the sodium of the common salt and not the chlorin which favorably influence the growth of crops.

It was found that the sodium reduced evaporation and increased the water-holding power of the soil. It is also thought that through an exchange of bases it is capable of rendering certain relatively insoluble salts more available to plants. When sodium salts were used, the sodium was found almost exclusively in the leaves of the plants, where it apparently displaced a certain amount of potash. An increase in the sugar content of the beets also accompanied fertilization with sodium salts of the kinds tested.

Fall Freshners Best

There are varying opinions as to the best time to have dairy cows freshen, but a careful study of the records of 10,870 cows in 64 testing associations scattered all over this country, recently published by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, proves conclusively that cows dropping their calves in the fall produce more milk and butterfat.

On an average the cows that freshened in the fall months of September, October and November produced 6,689 pounds of milk; winter fresheners produced 6,439; summer, 5,941, and spring, 5,842. In spite of higher feeding cost, the fall fresheners made more income over and above feed cost, with winter fresheners second, spring third and summer fourth.

On a basis of individual months, however, the largest income over cost of feed was made by cows that freshened in December. October came a close second, November next, and January fourth. Cows that calved in October ranked first in both milk and butterfat production.

Although the evidence gathered shows conclusively that fall or early winter freshening is desirable in most parts of the country, there are exceptions to the rule. For example, the dairyman who has a steady market for milk at a fair price during all seasons of the year will usually find it to his advantage to keep the supply fairly uniform from month to month. The percentage of cows that should freshen each month in the year will vary to some extent in different localities, and with the different farms in the same locality. At present in market milk districts there is usually a surplus of milk in the late spring and early summer, and more cows should be allowed to freshen in the fall. Therefore it will easily be seen that this matter can well be given close study by dairymen.

Questions and Answers

CLOVER MILDEW.—I have read somewhere that clover mildew makes clover hay poisonous. I believe I have some of it on my farm this year, as the leaves looked silvery or gray. Can this hay be fed to horses? Is there any way of getting rid of the trouble?

J. McG., Minn.

A.—According to plant pathologists, clover mildew cannot be eradicated. They advise careful curing to make the hay fit for feeding but discourage its use for horses as the hay is likely to be "musty." It is not poisonous, however, and can safely be used for cattle. In the Mississippi valley, where the disease has been known for some time, it has been much more common during the past season, due, no doubt to the extremely wet spring. In dry seasons it is not likely to do serious damage, nor is it likely to become a dangerous menace to the valuable clover crop.

ABOUT BLUE-GRASS.—I should like to know more about blue-grass. You see, I had always thought that there was only one kind, the Kentucky blue-grass, but I have been told that there are two kinds. Is this the truth? For that reason, is it necessary to state what kind is wanted when I order from a seed house?

MRS. J. T., Tenn.

A.—Yes, it is true that there is more than one kind of blue-grass. There are three kinds, for that matter, but only two are important. The commonest is the familiar Kentucky blue-grass; the second is called Canada blue-grass; the third is termed Texas blue-grass. Kentucky blue-grass is native to only three large regions in the United States, namely Kentucky, the Virginias, and the southwestern portion of Wisconsin, where limestone underlies a rich clay soil. It has, however, been widely distributed until now it is generally grown not only in all parts of this country but in other parts of the world as well. Canada blue-grass is more hardy than the Kentucky variety; therefore it does better in Northern climates, and particularly in New York State and Ontario. The Texas variety is little known outside of the state from which it derives its name and the adjoining state of Oklahoma. Yes, it would be best for you to state which variety you desire to purchase from the seed houses. Generally Kentucky blue-grass is supplied, but sometimes this and the Canada are mixed. Living in Tennessee, you want the Kentucky, for it is well suited to your locality.

SUGAR FROM DAHLIAS.—Recently I came across a statement which said that sugar was now being made from the roots of dahlias. Is there any truth to this, and if so are the common garden dahlias used? Where has this been tried out? Is the sugar the same as we get from beets or sugar cane? I am interested in new things always, and like to keep up with the times.

MRS. M. V. S., Mo.

A.—It is true that sugar has been made from dahlia roots, but the work along this line is still in the experimental stage, though experiments conducted in Wisconsin indicate that it has real commercial possibilities. According to the experimenters, the biggest factor in its favor is the ease of growing the crop and the small expense attached; those who have had experience with sugar beets, and know intimately of the work and expense of thinning, weeding and harvesting, no doubt will be interested. All dahlia tubers are high in sugar content, but special sweet-rooted varieties are being developed in which the percentage of sugar is increased. When it is recalled that at present, after years of careful selection, sugar beets contain only about 10 per cent. of sugar, and that dahlias without special selection contain at least this amount, it is not to be wondered at if in time they will greatly surpass the beets. Another point in favor of dahlias is that they contain sugar in the form of fructose, which does not cause decay in the tubers in storage; beets, on the other hand, soon rot in storage because their sugar is in the form of sucrose. This makes the handling season, and the period of storage for beets, very short, whereas dahlia tubers could be stored either on the farm or at the refinery for months with safety. Dahlia sugar can be used for all ordinary household uses. It is somewhat finer than Cuban sugar, and better crystallized than pulverized sugar. Its greatest use, however, will be for soda fountain preparations, a large field in itself. Syrups made from dahlia sugar cause foaming, a very necessary factor in fountain use. This property is lacking in corn syrup, for instance, and therefore the latter has never been used with any degree of success. As to where the crop has been grown: Reports are few, but the best results seem to have come from the light sandy loam of the Lake States.

More Money in Trapping

surance of success. Young trappers will do well to follow their example—an ounce of foresight is worth a pound of hindsight.

There Will Be a Big Fur Crop This Winter

If your grain crop or stock raising has been poor during the past season, don't be discouraged because with the big improvement in the fur situation, trapping will again prove very profitable this winter. By going about the work systematically you can gather in your fur crop and make it pay you big returns.

Last year on account of the demoralized condition of the fur market and the low prices that prevailed for furs, very little trapping was done. This had the effect of causing the fur-bearing animals to greatly increase.

This season there will be a big crop of furs in almost every section. Prices on all kinds are going to be high enough to make trapping worth while.

The fur crop is an important crop—one that causes you neither effort nor expense to raise and yet a crop that produces for the farmers of the United States between twenty and twenty-five millions of dollars each year.

Do not overlook this important crop, especially if your finances are in such shape as to make this extra income needed or helpful.

Woman Trappers

Trapping is not so hard to learn as some may think. It may require a little time for the woman to become an expert in trapping; but an adequate proficiency can be acquired within a very short time and after that new knowledge rapidly and continuously comes to the traperette with a corresponding increase in her skill. Many women have already shown the skill and ability of veteran trappers.

Perhaps the most appealing side of trapping to the woman is the real profit that lies therein. Men trappers consistently engaged at this activity have made a great deal of money. Women can do the same. Whether working in spare time or full time, the trapperette will find this easy work very remunerative—bringing unexpected returns both in money and in health. Here is a woman's chance to be genuinely useful in supplying this demand and be paid for her work.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Bloat in Sheep

A SUCCESSFUL treatment for bloat in sheep is suggested by shepherds in New Zealand and Australia. The formula is as follows: Coleman's mustard, 16 ounces; bicarbonate of soda, seven ounces; ground ginger root, two ounces. Mix thoroughly and keep in a tightly closed can or fruit jar. The dose for an adult sheep is one tablespoonful placed far back in the mouth and at once washed down with about half a pint of cold water; or the powder may be mixed with the water. Great care has to be taken in drenching a sheep that choking or suffocation be not caused.

Shepherds in those countries have found that bloating on alfalfa will not be likely to occur if the sheep are taken off the alfalfa pasture after half an hour's grazing and allowed to rest for an hour. They may then be returned without further risk of bloating. Sheep should also be pastured on ordinary grass for a few hours before being turned on alfalfa in the morning.

American practice is to give a bloated sheep one dram each of pure turpentine, oil of eucalyptus and aromatic spirits of ammonia in two ounces of raw linseed oil and to repeat the treatment in half an hour if found necessary. In emergency cases, where such drugs are not at hand, immediately give the bloated sheep a pint of new, warm milk from a cow and repeat the dose in half to one hour, if needed. A dram of turpentine, or half a dram of formaldehyde added to the dose of milk is an improvement.

In some instances suffocation threatens and is indicated by gasping for air. In such a condition the gas should at once be liberated by inserting a trocar and canula high up in the most distended part of the paunch in the left flank. When the special instrument is not available, the large, clean blade of a knife should be thrust into the distended paunch and turned crosswise in the wound. In acute cases semi-fluid feed and gas gush out and life is saved. The resultant wound should then be cleansed, disinfected and, if large, will have to be sutured with silk or fine cord. Then pine tar may be applied.

DEATH OF PIG.—I had a pig I raised by hand and when two months old, one day it refused to eat and drank but little. The next morning her eyes seemed swollen and she refused to eat. She died soon after. She had been eating corn, and milk from a separator.
MRS. R. J. R.

A.—A post-mortem examination should have been made at once as it might have disclosed the cause of death. If care is not taken to remove the froth from separator milk it may kill pigs in just the way described. The breathing would indicate that pneumonia may have been present but it would be impossible for one at a distance to assign the exact cause of death.

PUFFED HOCK JOINTS.—I have a horse with hocks, which were caused by hard pulling. Is there any remedy for it and can it be cured? MRS. J. F.

A.—From your description we take it that the hock joints of the hind legs show soft distensions which are filled with synovia (joint oil). That condition probably constitutes bog spavin and thoroughpins for which there is no certain remedy. Some good may be done by patient use of a proprietary reducing preparation which you can buy at a drug store, or by rubbing in some 10 per cent. iodine vasogen or petrogen once or twice daily. Treatment, however, usually proves rather unsatisfactory.

GARGET.—Will you tell me what ails my cow? There are times when milking her I can feel a hard place in her teat and it will swell. The milk will be stringy and lumpy. She gives about four gallons of milk and I cannot make her go dry. She has been like this for several years but worse since freshening last April; eats heartily, but is thin. I cannot get her to gain in flesh. C. S. L.

A.—The condition you describe is usually called garget (mammitis) and it has been present so long it will be likely to prove incurable. As tuberculosis of the udder is a possibility, it would be wise to have a qualified veterinarian apply the tuberculin test. If that is not done the milk should not be used. The milk from a tuberculous cow is dangerous for use by people or animals. Meanwhile milk three times daily, and each other evening rub into the caked parts of the udder a little iodine ointment.

MILKLESS QUARTER.—I have a heifer 18 months old that has just freshened. Her left front teat has no milk in it. There is no garget for I know what that is.

A.—When young calves are allowed to suck one another's teats after being fed milk garget may be induced and result in another attack at calving time or in milklessness of a quarter such as you describe. There is little prospect that the affected quarter will regain its lost function, but we should advise you to go through all the motions of milking that quarter three times daily. Massage it well each time. If you cannot do this, then let a calf nurse, as that may induce secretion of the milk. If you think that the duct of the teat is closed, insert a milking tube, boiled for 15 minutes, and it may clear the passage so that milk can be stripped away.

INDIGESTION.—I have a six-year-old horse that I have been trying to fatten since he was three years old. I feed him good clover hay and corn three times a day and he runs on good pasture. He stays filled out until I drive him and ride him, then his bowels become loose and he becomes thin. C. H.

A.—Have the teeth put in order by a veterinarian and then change the feed gradually, substituting a mixture of oats and one-ninth part of wheat bran, by weight, to be dampened at feeding time. Add ear corn in cold weather. Carrots would be good for him. Better keep him off grass and feed old mixed clover and timothy hay in preference to grass or new hay, and also feed old oats. Allow free access to rock salt. Write again if this change of feed does not mend matters satisfactorily.

DIFFICULT BREATHING.—My dog cannot get his breath. He breathes through his nose, then opens his mouth for breath to come out. He wheezes and snores all of the time. He is worse on hot days. What is the matter and is there a cure? D. W.

A.—We suspect that this dog has goiter or that other glands are interfering with breathing. A personal examination would, however, be necessary to determine the exact condition present. Expose the dog two or three times daily to steam from water containing one tablespoonful of compound tincture of benzoin or oil of eucalyptus to the quart. Accomplish this by setting the dog on a cane-bottomed chair, placing the vessel of hot water underneath the chair seat and then covering dog and chair with a sheet. Hold the dog there for about 10 minutes each time. If a swelling of the throat, or goiter, is noticeable, clip off the hair and apply tincture of iodine twice a week. Write again when necessary.

CHOKED MARE.—I have a mare five years old that stands with her head down as though she were listening. Her throat is swollen and sometimes for a minute thick slobbers run from her mouth. Will you tell me what is wrong?

A.—The symptoms described are those of choking, and unless the administration of oil relieved the condition the horse would soon succumb. A veterinarian may do some good in such a case by hypodermic injection of such alkaloidal drugs as pilocarpin, eserine, etc., and may even pass a probang down the gullet to remove the obstruction, but home treatment rarely succeeds. Distension of the stomach with gas may cause similar symptoms, and that also usually proves fatal unless a veterinarian successfully passes a tube into the stomach to syphon off the excessive liquid and allow escape of gas.

SELF-SUCKING COW.—I have a three-year old cow that is forming the habit of sucking her own milk. Will you give me a remedy to break the habit? J. V.

A.—Here are some plans for prevention of self-sucking: Put a straight bar bit in the cow's mouth or put a bull ring in her nose and from that hang another ring. It may be necessary to hang a third ring from the second one. Put an old horse collar upside down on the cow's neck, or a cradle made of pointed slats woven with smooth wire and put on with the slats running lengthwise of the neck. Another good plan is to fit a light pole with a snap-hook at each end, place it between the forelegs and hang it there by a light chain from a halter and another from a surcingle around the body.

Thousands Of Women Are Now Taking This Newer Form Of Iron

Worn-out Housewife Tells How She Quickly Regained Her Health and Strength.

"Only a short two weeks ago I was a tired, nervous and worn-out from the drain on my nerves and strength of household drudgery that I thought I could not keep up another day.

A short two weeks' treatment of the new form of iron has given me a marvelous increase in health, strength and energy. Now I can do my whole house without help, and do not have to have to sit at home in the evening "all-in" sick and nervous."

"The above is a typical hypothetical case," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Out-Door Dept.) New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. "You cannot be well and strong and full of vigor, force and power unless your blood is rich in iron. It is your red blood that enables you to resist and overcome disease and that nourishes every organ in your body. Without iron your blood becomes thin, pale and watery. Poor blood cannot nourish your vital organs and as a result you may have pains in your heart or kidneys, indigestion, headaches, and feel all "run-down" and tired out."

When your blood lacks iron do not waste your time taking stimulating medicines or narcotic drugs, but directly enrich your blood with the newer form of iron sold by all druggists under the name of Nuxated Iron, which is like the iron in spinach, lentils, and apples, and is in a form easily assimilated into your blood.

Get a bottle of Nuxated Iron today. Take it for two weeks and if you have not, like thousands of others, obtained most surprising health, strength and energy, the manufacturers will promptly refund your money. Your local druggists will sell you Nuxated Iron with this "satisfaction or money back" guarantee.

A Stubborn Cough Loosens Right Up

This home-made remedy is a wonder for quick results. Easily and cheaply made.

Here is a home-made syrup which millions of people have found to be the most dependable means of breaking up stubborn coughs. It is cheap and simple, but very prompt in action. Under its healing, soothing influence, chest soreness goes, phlegm loosens, breathing becomes easier, tickling in throat stops and you get a good night's restful sleep. The usual throat and chest colds are conquered by it in 24 hours or less. Nothing better for bronchitis, hoarseness, croup, throat tickle, bronchial asthma or winter coughs.

To make this splendid cough syrup, pour 2½ ounces of Pinex into a pint bottle and fill the bottle with plain granulated sugar syrup and shake thoroughly. If you prefer use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, you get a full pint—a family supply—of much better cough syrup than you could buy ready-made for three times the money. Keeps perfectly and children love its pleasant taste.

Pinex is a special and highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, known the world over for its prompt healing effect upon the membranes.

To avoid disappointment ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

She Is Looking For A Mother

"Peggy" The New Winter Doll

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Do You Want Her?

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

MRS. J. C. D., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving two or more children, and a widow who is the parent of all his children, such widow, in addition to certain small allowance, would be entitled to receive one-third of the estate after payment of debts and expenses. (2) We think that if the administrator of the estate you mention refuses to pay you the share coming to you it will be necessary for you to proceed against him in the court from which he received his appointment to compel him to do so.

N. B. M., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would be entitled to receive all the personal estate and to one-half of the real estate, the balance of the real estate going to his father or mother; if neither survive him the whole estate would go to his widow.

MRS. F. W. U., Connecticut.—We do not think you will be able to trace your husband's line of descent without more information to work upon than your communication discloses. We think that in tracing genealogy the usual method is through family bibles, tombstones, baptismal records, marriage records, deed and mortgage records, record of wills or letters of administration in the settlement of estates, records of enlistments for war, genealogical histories in large public libraries, directories and lists of inhabitants, tax records and other sources of a similar nature, but for any such search it is necessary to have a beginning point.

MRS. E. J. C., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your husband's children by a former marriage would have no interest in your separate estate unless some provision is made for them by will, except that in case you die without a will or in case you leave your husband a portion of your separate property by will, his children by both marriages will in turn receive their shares in his estate unless cut off by will. We think insurance money upon the death of the insured is payable to the beneficiary named in the policy of insurance.

E. C. W., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, the surviving widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would receive all the personal estate and one-half of the real estate, the balance of the real estate going to his parents, brothers and sisters, depending upon who is left; if none such, the whole estate goes to the surviving widow. (2) Money in bank or upon the person of the decedent would form a part of the personal estate.

M. E. T., Kentucky.—We do not think your sister's husband has any interest in his son's real estate during the son's lifetime; we think that in case he survives his son and is not cut off by will, upon the death of the son he would inherit from him unless the son at the time of his death leaves nearer relatives.

L. J., Pennsylvania.—If no records were kept at the time of your birth and if there is no person alive who can give information as to the date of your birth, we think it will be impossible for you to fix the date. (2) Under the laws of your state, we do not think your brothers and sisters will inherit any portion of your estate unless some provision is made for them by will as your wife and children would inherit your property under your intestacy laws in preference to relatives of a more remote degree.

MRS. D. J., Alabama.—If your brother refuses to purchase your interest in the land left by your father in Georgia, we think you can proceed with an action for the partition of the same, or for the sale of the property and the division of the money proceeds of the sale.

H. L. W., Missouri.—Under the laws of Arkansas, we are of the opinion that real and personal property descends, first, to children or their descendants, in equal parts; second, if there be no children, then to the father, then to the mother, if both are dead, then to the brothers or sisters of their descendants in equal shares.

MRS. T. C. W., Texas.—We think it would have been necessary for your husband to have survived his parents to have acquired a vested interest in their estates, and we do not think that you, as his widow, would be entitled to share in his parent's estates, but we think his children would receive his share from their grandparents, unless cut off by will, and we think that in case of their minority you would be entitled to be appointed guardian of your children's estates upon making the proper application for such appointment; we think in case of the intestacy of the grandparents their case should be administered by an administrator appointed by the court, who must account to all of the parties in interest in the estate. (2) We think the holder of the mortgage you mention would have a legal right to foreclose same as soon as there is any default in the payment thereof.

M. L. W., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it would have been necessary for you or your mother to have commenced your action for the recovery of the land formerly belonging to your grandfather within the time limited by law for the bringing of such actions; we think this time has now expired.

J. D. S., Alabama.—In the absence of any contract to the contrary we do not think the man you mention can compel his former employer to provide employment for him.

MRS. O. M. G., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in cases where the parents are separated the custody of the minor children is a question for the court before which the case is tried to decide, taking into consideration the welfare of the children, the award may be to either parent the court decides can best provide for and bring up such children.

MISS O. P., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the surgeon who operated upon you is entitled to pay for his services and can compel you to pay him from any property you may own not exempt by law from levy under execution; if you have no property or income, we do not think he can collect his fee.

MRS. M. E. F., Louisiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that every marriage superinduces a right of partnership or community of the acquits and gains, if there be no stipulation to the contrary, of the reciprocal industry and labor during the marriage of both husband and wife and that such property acquired by them during marriage by donation made to them jointly or by purchase in the name of either is community property and that upon the death of either, leaving no ascendants and no descendants, and leaving no will, such decedents' one-half share of such property would go to the surviving spouse, and the other half of such community property would belong to such survivors in his or her own right, but in the absence of a will, we think, the separate property of the husband upon his death, except as to some small provisions, would all go to his ascendants and descendants or his near collateral relatives; in the absence of any such his surviving widow would inherit from him.

MRS. A. Z. H., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of either husband or wife one-half of the community property, subject to the community debts, goes to the survivor, and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the decedent, subject also to the community debts; in case there is no will, we think it descends to his or her legitimate issue, and if there be no issue it descends to the survivor.

R. W., Virginia.—We think your father had a legal right to transfer the piece of real estate you mention to your mother, provided he possessed mental capacity, and no undue influence was exercised upon him in procuring the deed.

R. A. W., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a court proceeding will be necessary for the transfer of your insane wife's interest in your real estate; we think, however, that if she has but a dower interest in the property such interest will terminate upon her death.

T. M., Ohio.—If the title of the property you mention stands in the names of both husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, we think that upon the death of one, the whole property becomes the sole property of the survivor.

O. D., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, such property as came to him in any method other than by descent, devise or deed of gift would, after payment of debts and expenses, all go to his surviving widow, but if his property came to him by devise, descent or deed of gift from an ancestor the surviving widow would be limited to a life estate in the real property in case any descendant of the ancestor from whom the property came was living, and in case the property came to him by descent, devise or deed of gift from a former wife, the relatives of such former wife would share in the property, provided any were living within the degrees of relationship to make them entitled to share.

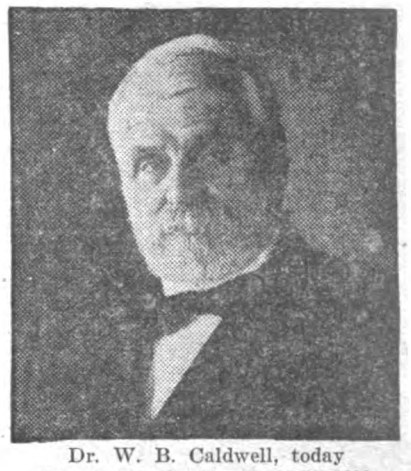
B. H. P., New Mexico.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if a testator dies, leaving a child or children, or, in case of their death, descendants of such child or children, not named or provided for in his will, such testator shall, as regards such child or children, or their descendants not provided for, be deemed to have died intestate; which applies whether such descendants be living or posthumous.

A. I. A., South Dakota.—We do not think your father would be relieved from payment of the goods purchased by him by reason of the assumption of the payment by the person to whom he resold same, unless your father's creditors agreed to accept the agreement of your father's debtor and to release your father from his obligation to pay for same; we think your father can be compelled to pay for the goods from any property he may own not exempt by law from levy under execution; we think your father's money in bank and accounts payable can be applied toward his indebtedness in the proper creditors' action or proceeding brought for the purpose. (2) We think a chattel mortgage is a mortgage upon chattels as distinguished from a mortgage upon real estate.

MRS. G. W. A., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your husband's creditors can enforce the payment of the note you mention when the same becomes due from any property your husband may own, except such as is exempt by law from levy under execution.

MRS. D. G., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a woman, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving husband and children, such surviving husband would be entitled to receive one-half of the estate, and that his share cannot be diminished by will.

$10,000 Worth of Syrup Pepsin Free



I will give away this amount of money in my own medicine —There is a free trial bottle waiting for every family that has a sufferer from constipation —Send today for your bottle

TO commemorate my 84th birthday I have set aside $10,000 in cash to be expended entirely on free trial bottles of my Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which as people know has been successfully used for over 30 years and is today the largest selling family laxative in the world. In spite of that fact there must be literally thousands of families who have never tried it, and these are the ones I hope to reach with my $10,000 offer.

I want to prove to them that my Syrup Pepsin is a better-acting, safer, finer laxative than any other they can obtain. But I don't want them to be at any expense in trying it, and hence I offer a test bottle free. Later on, when thoroughly convinced of its unusual merits they can buy a bottle of their druggist. Over 10 million bottles of Syrup Pepsin are now sold every year in drug stores, yet my company will not profit one cent when you buy your first bottle. It costs us more to sell the first one than we get for it. Our profit comes only when a family keeps it regularly in the house, as I expect yours will when you are once convinced.

Many unthinking parents are giving children strong cathartics; old people are taking salt waters and powders that make them dry and thirsty and which have to be repeated every day; women are using artificial coal-tar drugs in candy form that cause skin eruptions. Don't do it! See that only a plain vegetable laxative is used, not a druggy physic. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a vegetable compound of Egyptian senna and pepsin with pleasant-tasting aromatics. Just that! The formula is on the package.

I want you to have a free trial bottle of Syrup Pepsin in your home. I want you to share in my $10,000 offer. Yet

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, today
Born Shelbyville, Mo., March 27, 1839

I know if you delay answering you will be disappointed. Ask me now for the free trial bottle if anyone in your family has constipation, biliousness, flatulency, wind or gas on the stomach, sour colicky stomach, headache, loss of appetite and sleep, indigestion, intestinal poisoning, dyspepsia. Syrup Pepsin is intended for just such conditions. Watch it break up a fever or a cold!

Let me send you a trial bottle to prove these facts. My saying so won't prove it half as well as your trying it. Be one of the thousands who will use Syrup Pepsin free because of my 84th birthday. Send the coupon, or your address in any way most convenient to you. But do it quickly.

Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 553 Washington St., Monticello, Illinois

In commemoration of your 84th birthday, and as my family has never used your Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, send me a free trial bottle to the address below:

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

MRS. J. S., Savage, Miss.—We are sorry, but we have to tell you that there are no publishing houses who would accept the work of unknown and inexperienced writers, publish such works at the firms' expense, and then make payment to the authors of a certain share of the proceeds. Publishers are only interested in accepting work which has merit making its sale certain and profitable, and it would be necessary for you to obtain more experience than you now have before you could compete successfully with the many trained writers who themselves often have difficulty in profitably disposing of their brainwork.

R. P. S., Eldorado Springs, Mo.—You could obtain, we think, a competent training in civil engineering at the University of Missouri, situated at Columbia in your state; and also at Washington University in your big city of St. Louis. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass., is generally regarded as standing at the head of such institutions as specialize in technical education.

J. P., Byars, Okla.—The re-silvering of a mirror is not an amateur job, and we doubt if you can accomplish it successfully at home. However, as you are but one of many COMFORT readers who seem to wish to attempt the task, we give you the following method which is recommended by the Scientific American: Place the mirror face downward on a table and, with a bit of cotton, clean and polish well the place to be silvered. Now spread on the spot a piece of tinfoil a little larger than the place to be repaired. After spreading smoothly, let fall on the center of it a drop of metallic mercury and, with a bit of cotton, rub the spot where the foil is until it becomes brilliant. Now place on this new amalgam a sheet of smooth writing paper and on it pile books or a weight of some sort. The weight need not be great but sufficient to keep the new amalgam in contact with the glass. The amount of mercury used should correspond as nearly as possible to three drams to each square foot of surface to be repaired.

MRS. J. H. C., Oakwood, Mo.—To conquer the pest of weevils in your flour bin, remove all the present flour and scrub the bin thoroughly with a solution made by adding a tablespoonful of borax to each quart of hot water. Be sure the bin is well dried before you put in any new flour. You need not necessarily waste your present infested flour. Screen it carefully, and spread in large pans and dry for several hours in a slow oven.

O. A., Tioga, Ga.—You should certainly complete your high school course before commencing the study of electrical engineering. This profession is a profitable one and with increasing opportunities as "white coal" becomes more developed in various parts of our country. (2) There would be nothing that might be termed "dangerous" about the profession of electrical engineering. In electrical work, linesmen and those who have the duties of handling and connecting high-powered wires are often in positions where care must be taken to prevent accident, but the engineering and technical part of electrical work is a very different thing from some of its subsidiary jobs with which we think you confuse it in your inquiry.

C. E., Guilford College, N. C.—A marine is what might be termed a "sea soldier." He is stationed in certain numbers aboard the larger warships of our navy and goes ashore in landing parties when some duties of a land force are attempted by our ships. A marine does not have the regular ship duties of a sailor, but is required to take more drill than falls to the lot of Uncle Sam's bluejackets. Marines are often stationed on land at our various navy yards. Although opinions would differ, we think you would prefer a navy enlistment to one in the marines. You can obtain information regarding pay, etc., from the U. S. Marine Corps, Washington, D. C. (2) There are shore training stations at Newport, R. I., Hampton Roads, Va., Great Lakes, Ill., San Francisco, Cal., and Gulfport, Miss., to which men are assigned for training after enlistment in the U. S. Navy. Such shore training is necessary before a man would be of any use aboard a warship. This shore training lasts for four months and then assignment to shipboard is made. The navy has a system of trade schools which offer considerable educational advantages to enlisted men. A life in the navy is a healthful one and offers conditions of travel and adventure which appeal to youth. Our navy, under the new "scrapping" of ships has lately suffered a loss in personnel, and we are unable to tell you what the requirements or needs are for men at this time. Write to the Bureau of Navigation, Washington, D. C., for just the particulars you wish.

MRS. L. C., Cates, Ind.—Nature makes no exceptions such as you describe, and there is no day of the year or sign of the moon when bushes may be cut without sprouting. Bushlands which are burned over in the spring of the year when in first leaf, may be most successfully cleared by removing the remaining wood, burning it on the land, and plowing in the fall, or earlier if more convenient.

MRS. C. B., Salem, Wisc.—A cracked raincoat may be restored, so that it will not leak, by placing it in boiling water for 15 minutes. This method is furnished by a COMFORT friend, C. E. Swineheart, of Hartville, O., who states that he has worked in the making of rubber goods for 10 years.

MISS R. S., Guyaz, Idaho.—A telegraph operator should have, in addition to proficiency at the "key," a good knowledge of English, be a capable speller, and able to operate a typewriter. Shorthand is convenient, but not essential. We could not tell you what various schools might charge for a course in telegraphy nor what would be the nearest school to your locality. Can you not ask these questions of some telegrapher near your home? (2) Address this business college at their Springfield, Mo., branch. They will be able to promptly send you the addresses of their other colleges.

A COMFORT READER, Glenmore, La.—Billions of feet of lumber are cut in California each year, the greater part of this huge production coming from the northern part of the big coast state. The high elevation of the mountainous section in which this lumber is produced insures a dry and exceedingly healthful climate—something in which California is a specialist and of which she has all sorts and temperatures in stock at all seasons of the year. Humboldt County might be considered the leading lumber section, and this one county has produced over eleven million dollars' worth of lumber in a single year. Eureka, in this county, is a thriving town of over 17,000 population, where you would be assured of good schools for your children, if you made this community your new home. There are mining and manufacturing interests in the vicinity which help on the question of all-year opportunities for employment. Write to the editor of the Eureka Times, asking, as a prospective settler, for a copy of his journal. From the columns of this paper you will be able to find out necessary facts regarding rents, business chances, etc.

Two Wheel Chairs in October

655 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The two October wheel chairs go to John Oliver Smalley, R. 1, Pisgah, Ala., 80; Mrs. Nancy E. Lawson, Greenwood, Ark., 75. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these recipients or by their friends for them.

John Oliver Smalley, age 41, is a helpless cripple and has been so all his life. Except for slight use of his left hand he is as helpless as a baby and cannot even turn himself in bed. He is dependent for support and care on his aged parents and friends. Mrs. Smalley writes that the chair will be appreciated by him, and of course it will be a great help to her and her husband in caring for their unfortunate son which becomes a greater burden as their strength declines with advancing years.

MRS. PEARSON ALTHOUSE ENJOYING HER WHEEL CHAIR.

Mrs. Nancy E. Lawson, age 71, is confined to her bed and has been for the past three years because of a broken hip that will not heal, due to a fall. She is a widow dependent on her married daughter who has five children besides her invalid mother to care for, the excessive strain of which is beginning to show in the impairment of the daughter's health. This wheel chair will indeed be a blessing to this family.

CLOVIS COLVIN AND HER PET ENJOYING HER WHEEL CHAIR TOGETHER.

I implore you to let a little of the spirit of Thanksgiving for the many blessings which you enjoy inspire you to make an extra effort this month to help swell the good work of our Wheel-Chair Club.

You will be interested in the pictures of Mrs. Pearson Althouse and little Clovis Colvin enjoying their COMFORT wheel chairs and in the accompanying letters of thanks here printed.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me state that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 15 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB and in claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Appreciates Her Wheel Chair Very Much

Perkasie, Pa.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

My grandmother, Mrs. Pearson Althouse, has had another picture taken of herself in her COMFORT wheel chair, and I am enclosing you with the hope that it may be suitable to be printed in COMFORT. You know she received her chair more than a year ago, and she appreciates it very much. She uses it almost every day in the house and frequently goes out on the porch in it. She hopes you may live long to continue your good work, for such it is. We renew our thanks for all past courtesies.

Yours truly,

Louisa Althouse.

Enjoying Her COMFORT Wheel Chair and Her Pet Together

Vienna, La.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I enclose a picture of little Clovis Colvin and her little dog enjoying her wheel chair together. Words cannot express our heart-felt thanks to you and all others who helped us obtain the chair. I shall show my appreciation by sending in more subscriptions soon to help on the good work of COMFORT'S Wheel-Chair Club.

Sincerely yours,

seam. The ribbon loop slips on a nail or hook while the pin holds the garment. This is a useful gift for a sister or daughter at school where it is impossible to use the ordinary hangers.

For an invalid or convalescent friend here is a gift that is sure to be appreciated. Take a square of cloth, one yard or wider, cut diagonally from one corner to the center, then cut a round hole in center for neck. Turn an inch edge all around outside and up diagonal part and work with wool. Finish neck same way and you have an ideal covering to slip on over the night gown. It can be trimmed with ribbon ties or furnished with clasps for closing and makes an acceptable gift for anyone in a hospital or an invalid at home.

SOOKY BLUE SKY.

ELLISVILLE, MISS.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

Here I am at last. I always said I would do it but have never had the courage to write until now.

About Christmas presents, have you ever thought how a flower loving friend would enjoy a potted plant? You who have plants can very easily get a few cuttings started for Christmas presents. I haven't many flowers but am trying to get a start.

Did you ever try planting cypress vines in porch boxes made from one post to the other and letting them hang over the side to hide the ugliness?

I would like to correspond with any of the sisters who care to write. MRS. W. R. SIMMONS.

IOWA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE SISTERS:

Though I've written twice before and failed of admittance I'll try again. This time I'll talk about Christmas presents. I usually send COMFORT to three or four friends every year and get whatever premium I think useful and give to someone else. Last year I sent COMFORT to four friends and the birthstone brooch I got as a premium I gave to one sister. For a sister out West, I am making a snapshot book of home and home folks. I have the book ready and paste in it the pictures as I take them, Dad and the boys haying or the boys fishing or our 4th of July jaunt.

I save all the scraps, as I do my own sewing, and make little aprons and dresses for children. Some of them are combined of two colors but are just as pretty. The pockets are of bunnies or kittens appliqued on goods. I usually have my Christmas presents all done before the rest think of it and can enjoy my Christmas in peace. I hunt for bargains the year around and have a big box marked "Christmas" where I put everything as I buy it.

I keep house for my father (the best ever) and two brothers on a 240 acre farm, eight miles west of the Mississippi River. I canned nearly 400 quarts of fruit from such distress by simply chewing one or two Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after meals. A host of people have gone back to fried eggs and bacon, sausage, doughnuts, baked beans, pie and cheese, steak and onions, cucumbers, cream with coffee and so on because they discovered that after eating such things, a Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablet gave the stomach a sweetened alkaline effect and there was no sour, acid, gassy heartburn, belching, pressure and such distresses due to indigestion after eating. It is well to take notice of this and to get a 60 cent box of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets at any drug store. Be armed and prepared for the big dinners and banquets.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

J. D., Hall, Ia.—No, indeed; a boy is lacking in technique when he is so nastily unkind as to commence "taking out" a second girl before he has properly or for any reason left an earlier sweetheart. Ever the ancient rule is: "It is well to be off with the old love before you are on with the new." But boys are breakers of rules and other things and pay little heed to old sayings when new pink cheeks and curls begin to speak. Let him go his way, we advise, and see if Fate will not produce some less fickle-minded youngster. This might happen, you know. (2) A teacher is quite within her rights in giving as much "home work" as she may think necessary for her pupils' good or the accomplishment of any course. Yet her own wisdom should prevent her crowding too much her scholars' brains or evenings. We think seventh- or eighth-grade pupils are capable of doing a reasonable amount of home work, and if a teacher advises against too many evening amusements, her advice is good and worth taking. Of course boys and girls must have amusements, but this does not necessarily mean too many late hours to make sleepy eyes and brain. The real answer is reason and moderation. For all work and no play will make Jill a dull girl, perhaps, and Jack a stupider chap than kind Nature may have meant.

I. S., Olney, Ill.—Certainly you must ask this girl what kind of ice cream she wishes when you take her to such a treat. You would not want her to have to moodily devour maple-nut when her lips might be craving chocolate-marshmallow. And it does no harm to etiquette and shows a cherful and liberal spirit if you ask her to have a second dish. We have known some girls to eat five. But good manners and finance will be satisfied if you offer only the second saucerful.

M. S., Kissimmee, Fla.—In an ice cream parlor, a restaurant, or in any like place or instance, it would be the girl's place to signify when she was ready to leave. (2) This is one of the things that matters little, but it would usually happen, we think, that a girl would be the first to say "good night", when an escort had brought her to her home. Some boys require more than a "good night" as hint to start them on their way—and there are some girls who will not want to give the hint. Times and circumstances govern here and etiquette is silent on the matter.

O. B., Ashland, Okla.—Surely you don't want to be a "leftover"—just useful when the other girl is not around. Let this boy see that you will have to be first choice or none. It will be good for him to have to make the decision and best for you to know just how much he cares. (2) We think you might take this boy's promise about behaving properly at its face value and give him another chance. However, you will know better than we do just how much his promises are worth and whether or not you can safely trust him. We are not favorably impressed with what you tell about him, and perhaps your instinct to drop him is a wise and correct one.

BROKENHEARTED BOBBIE, Wheeler, Texas.—You must love this boy very much when you are able to accept so calmly the way he is treating you—going steadily with this other girl, and then occasionally telling you he loves you and speaking of "when we get married." Tell him if he wants this other girl that he must stick to her—and better than he has to you, and also let him know that you do not mean to quietly wait for him to get over this new infatuation—or perhaps not get over it at all. Give him the choice and chance, and then be contented to drop him if he still hangs on to his new love. For if he does not appreciate your sincere faithfulness and affection, he is not worth your loving or capable of ever making you happy. And so you had better be grieving for a while than unhappy for years.

IN DOUBT, Kusa, Okla.—In these days of independence and feminine emancipation, a boy and girl walk side by side without any linking of arms. Where the going is unsafe or difficult for any reason, a boy may offer his hand or arm to assist a girl, or he may take her by the arm to lead or direct through a crowd or dangerous crossing.

L. B., Davenport, Fla.—It is a mere matter of friendly choice—the selection of a table in an ice cream parlor. A girl may say, "Let us sit here," and her escort should not object to her selection of seats. However, if he picks out a table, and she does not like it, she may tell him so and suggest another—for etiquette means that the lady is to be pleased. It would be a pleasant and correct courtesy for the boy to "pull out" the chair for the girl to seat herself—and a quite necessary attention in the case of some of the hinged and swinging seats to which ice-cream parlors are addicted in an inventive age.

C. S., Hennessey, Okla.—By saying you are to "be married away from home," we imagine you mean a simple ceremony at a church parsonage. If so, it would be correct for you to wear a "going away" gown. This might be a well-made, plainly-tailored costume, with hat, shoes and gloves to harmonize. Serge or broadcloth, in some medium or dark color becoming to your type, would be suitable. A "going away" costume is one adaptable to train travel, and you should remember this in selecting materials and style of making.

O. R., Little York, Ind.—It is easy to "imagine" yourself in love with this smiling youth, and certainly imagination is as far as the love question should go, when you are both of ages which mean entrance to high school this winter. Smile at each other as much as you like, but if you want your teachers to smile also, don't forget to look just as pleasantly and often at your books as you do at each other. (2) Of course you must not let boys hug and kiss you "when they want to." Tell these liberty-seeking and too-loving boys to "keep off." They will respect you more and end by liking you the better. For the girls easiest to kiss are not the ones best to love—when the time for real love comes. And this time is never during high school terms, my dear.

R. V. Z., Stanley, Wisc.—We have never seen it done, nor has etiquette a specific ruling in the matter, but we have heard it said that the best way to thank a fiance for an engagement ring is with a kiss. For most certainly you must thank him in some way. Surely you must have known this when you asked. (2) When you are asked to marry a man, why should you think any answer is better than a plain and satisfactory "yes"? Unless, of course, that you want to say "no"—which can be made just as plain. A proposal is an important matter which needs a distinct answer incapable of misunderstanding by either party. So add whatever you like to your "yes" or "no"—but let what you say be plain and straightforward.

MRS. W. J. B., Sweet Water, Texas.—This wine-colored broadcloth frock for your girl of six would, of course, be made in one piece and to fasten in the back. It could be attractively trimmed by an insertion in the yoke of shirred silk—this silk to be of a slightly lighter shade than the cloth, and bordered by fancy hand stitching in coarse yellow silk or Roman floss. Trim the cuffs of the little sleeves with like silk—appliqued either plain or shirred and having hand stitching also. The skirt should be plainly pleated in about six pleats of two or three inches wide. We would prefer no trimming on a skirt where broadcloth was the material. Have a simple low collar, cut square both front and back, and trim and stitch this with silk in such a way as seems best to frame your little girl's face and neck, according to her height and coloring. There is a peculiar "flat" yellow, in a shade approaching "corn" color, which would be the best harmonizing yellow shade to select for the hand stitching.

J. S., Kaufman, Texas.—A man at a dinner table unfolds a napkin and places it across his knees. When it is necessary that the napkin be used in any way for the hands or mouth during the meal, this should be done as inconspicuously as possible and without spreading the napkin more than possible to the sight of one's fellow diners. After a meal where finger-bowls are used, a napkin comes into play to dry the fingers, and also to wipe lips which may have been previously moistened by dampened fingers. At hotel and restaurant tables and at formal dinners, a napkin is not folded at the close of a meal, but left at the side of the place. At simple home dinners it is usually the best courtesy to fold the napkin at the meal's finish. (2) Any good book store can supply you with, or order for you, a book such as you describe.

Lady's and Gent's Style. The illustration shows our Lady's Sterling Silver Style (regular $3.50 now $3 or two for $5, Lady's or Gent's). The $5 gold (Lady's or Gent's) comes in Colonial Hexagon shape. The Henber has many distinctive features: repelling lead device; safety clasp; chase engraved barrel; non-clogging mechanism, etc.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor. Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. J. P. S., Belmont, N. C.—Have the boy take, for his bronchial asthma, a teaspoonful of pertussin after meals.

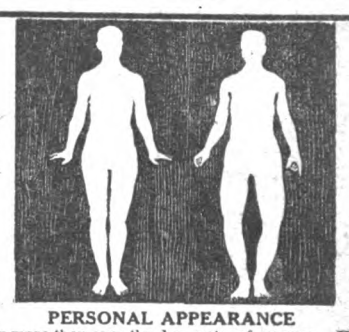
MRS. O. O. S., Newkirk, Okla.—If there is a lump in the breast, better consult some good surgeon at once and follow his advice as to operation. If there is only pain and discomfort it may be of neuralgic origin. In the latter case, probably Warburg's tincture will help you. Take a teaspoonful, well diluted, after meals.

MISS L. P., Pall Mall, Tenn.—You have gas in the intestines, due to eating sweets and candies. Avoid sweets of all kinds. Take, at night, two teaspoonfuls of fluid extract of cascara sagrada as a laxative. The enlarged abdomen is due to intestinal indigestion. Proper diet and the use of cathartics will cure you.

MRS. A. P., Oakley, Tenn.—Have the urine examined and find out what the condition of the kidneys is. In the meantime you can take a five-grain tablet of urotropin after meals. You should also drink plenty of water daily. You can douche the vagina with normal, hot saline solution for the discharge mentioned.

MRS. L. J., Custer, Okla.—You are not approaching the "change of life," as you think. Try a two-grain capsule of ovarian substance morning and night and see what this remedy will do toward remedying your period irregularity. This remedy will help your nervousness also.

MRS. A. J. S., Cherryville, N. C.—Operation on the hemorrhoids is the only way for you to get relief. Be operated on at once.



MISS R. T., Bardwell, Ky.—Just drink the sweet skimmed milk on the alternate days and use nothing else as food on the days you drink the milk. On the other days eat only those foods that do not add to your weight. Avoid starchy foods at all times—bread, sweets and pastries of all kinds. Eat only green vegetables and drink plenty of water.

MISS G. F., Puygallup, Wash.—Excessive and strenuous exercise at the time of menstruation should be avoided. The trouble with your ears is due to catarrh of the nasal passages. Spray the nose and throat with Dobell's solution three times a day.

MRS. C. T. W. (No address.)—The "Dogwood" can be gotten by your local druggist, if he will write to any wholesale house for the drug.

MRS. S. P., Miles, Ohio.—Cancer sometimes starts in the breast in the form of a "lump." Better be examined and if the lump mentioned seems to be adherent to the skin, have the lump removed at once.

MISS B. McC., Madison, N. C.—Remove the pimples with a comedo extractor, steam the face, and apply lotio alba at night. You must also avoid all foods that disagree with you, and keep your bowels free.

The usual method of autopsy has been followed, the bird being placed on its back on a board, the outstretched wings and the legs tacked in position, the skin covering the breast and abdomen removed, and the internal organs exposed to view by the removal of the entire breast-bone. In typical cases the following conditions are found:

Crop.—Empty, or partially filled with slimy fluid or with food.

Lungs.—Apparently normal.

Liver.—Pale, with streaks and patches of red. The congested areas are usually large in size. Occasionally epidemics will be met with in which the liver is more or less congested throughout. In such cases the portion of the stomach lying in contact with the liver is inflamed.

Kidney and Spleen.—Apparently normal.

Intestines.—Pale, and for the greater part empty. A small amount of dark grayish or brownish matter frequently present.

Cæca.—With few exceptions but partly filled with a grayish soft material. Only occasional cheesy or firm contents.

Unabsorbed yolk.—Usually present, varying in size from a pea to a full-sized yolk. The color may vary from yellow to brownish green or nearly black. In consistency there is also much variation. It may appear perfectly normal, distinctly gelatinous, or watery. Frequently it looks like custard and again it is more or less dry and firm. Unless the chick has been dead for some time the yolk is not putrid, but merely stale.

The chick appears as a whole more or less anæmic and emaciated. The muscles of the wings, breast and legs may be almost completely wasted away.

Additional Points of Practical Interest

There are several other matters which I believe should be brought to the attention of practical poultrymen at this time, even though there is not sufficient evidence to warrant making positive statements regarding them. Throughout the work a number of things have come up which are strongly suggestive, and which are regarded as being of such importance as to deserve further and thorough investigation.

The trap-nest records of individual hens, when studied in connection with the results of egg examinations, seem to indicate that infected hens are comparatively poor layers. This is especially true of those hens which are in their second and subsequent laying years. Apparently such hens lay regularly only in the spring and summer, the natural breeding season.

In order to secure further practical information on this point, an extended trip was made among poultrymen who make it a practice to raise winter chicks. In a very few cases there seemed to be evidence of white diarrhea infection, but the large majority of the men interviewed agreed that the chicks which are hatched in the late fall, winter or early spring are comparatively free from this disease.

Should these early observations be fully confirmed, the selection of breeding stock which is comparatively free from inspection would be greatly simplified.

The question has frequently been asked whether infection could spread from one hen to another, through food which has become contaminated with infected droppings. On this point there is no direct evidence, but that in view of the fact that infected and non-infected hens have been kept in the same pen for many months without any apparent spreading of infection, it seems highly improbable that the organism is conveyed from adult to adult in this manner. Experiments are being conducted to determine this point conclusively.

The question also naturally arises, may not the male bird carry the organism from one hen to another? The same course of reasoning may be followed here as in the previous instance, and the evidence is not regarded as being conclusive. It is quite probable that the organism in question is not carried in this way.

Whether or not adult male birds may be infected with bacterium pullorum is another matter which is still undecided. Should the possibilities of the transmission of bacterium pullorum from hen to hen, and through the agency of male birds, be actually eliminated, there is apparently but one explanation for the presence of the organism in question in the ovaries of adult females. It has already been demonstrated that chicks may have the disease when hatched, or acquire it very soon after hatching. The infected female chicks which survive the disease continue to carry the organism in their bodies, not in the various organs, as when they are young and visibly affected, but locally, as in the ovary. In other words, such chicks have become permanent bacillus carriers. The examination of the ovaries of half-grown pullets has given strong evidence in support of this theory.

Points to be remembered are:

1.—The original source of infection is the ovary of the mother hen.

2.—Eggs from infected hens contain the organism in the yolks.

3.—Chicks produced from infected eggs have the disease when hatched.

4.—The disease may be spread through the medium of infected food and water. Hence normal chicks may acquire it by picking up infected droppings or food contaminated thereby.

5.—Infection from chick to chick cannot, apparently, take place after they are three or four days of age.

6.—As a rule, infected chicks make less satisfactory growth than those that are apparently normal. For some time they appear stunted and weak, but may eventually undergo more or less complete development.

7.—The female chicks which survive often harbor the infection and may become bacillus carriers. Infection in the breeding pens is perpetuated in this manner.

8.—In all probability infection does not pass from adult to adult.

9.—Infected hens are apparently poor layers, especially in their second and subsequent laying seasons.

Practical Suggestions

It is of the greatest importance that the poultryman learn to recognize bacillary white diarrhea, both through external symptoms and post-mortem appearances of diseased chicks. The mere discharge of whitish material from the vent is not of itself proof that the chicks are affected with this specific disorder.

Infected hens should be eliminated from the breeding pens. Such elimination is made possible by pedigree records of the chicks. If the eggs from the different pens are hatched separately, and the chicks segregated for the first few days, it will soon be made apparent, through the condition of the chicks, which pens contain infected hens. This may prove effectual in cases where infection has not become general. To determine which individual hens are infected, the trap nest should be used, and the same general procedure followed.

Another possible means of determining infection of breeding hens is the direct examination of the ovaries. It is entirely practicable to inspect these organs through an opening in the side of the bird similar to that made in caponizing. Where the abnormal condition is marked it may be easily detected.

In case infection exists and it is not practicable to determine the breeders which are infected, the entire flock should be discarded for breeding purposes, and eggs for hatching secured from flocks which have been tested and found free from the disease. As for the means of preventing infection from chick to chick, keep the incubator dark from the time chicks commence to hatch, as that will prevent them from picking at the droppings, and then keep the chicks in small flocks for the first four days.

Since infected chicks make unsatisfactory development for the first few weeks, and may later regain vigor and make fair growth, it is advisable to select at an early age those intended for breeding purposes. The selection may be made when the chicks are from eight to ten weeks of age, reserving only those which show greatest vigor and development.

Food and water should be supplied in such a manner as to prevent contamination with infected droppings. The use of fine absorptive litter in the brooder, especially for the first few days, is also advisable.

The feeding of sour milk may prove very effective as a preventive measure. The milk must be fed early, or during the infection stage. After the white diarrhea organism has once entered the general circulation, such treatment is of little or no value. Hence, sour milk should not be looked upon as a cure, but merely as a possible preventive.

C. F.—It is quite hopeless to try doctoring young turkeys for blackhead after the disease is once established. The only practical help is along the lines of prevention. Refer to the October number of COMFORT. I devoted all our space in the poultry department to the subject of conditioning breeding stock to eliminate the disease in next year's hatches, so if you read that number carefully, you will have all the information I can give you on the subject.

L. C. F.—Please read answer to H. L. L. in this issue.

C. P.—You had better write to the secretary of the Silver Wyandotte Club of America, Mr. A. E. Retting, Indianopolis, Indiana, and ask him to send you the addresses of breeders in your vicinity.

J. J. K.—The chickens were suffering from chicken-pox. The continued wet weather that you had would account for the severity of the outbreak. The disease is usually introduced by a new bird—pigeons or wild birds that have visited the yards. Soften the crust which is formed over the spots by painting them with oil or vaseline, and after about an hour bathe the birds with warm, soapy water. Remove as much of the scabs as possible. Then anoint with carbolic ointment, or a saturated solution of boric acid. If the eyes are inflamed, bathe with the following solution: One and one-half ounces of boric acid, and one ounce of biborate of soda and a quart of warm water. As the disease is contagious, the house, the feed and drinking vessels should be disinfected constantly during the outbreak and for some time afterward. Any of the good sprays sold for cows are practical. Use a regular hand garden sprayer.

R. M. T.—Without doubt the trouble was roup. Your plan to disinfect and pull down the house, remove it to fresh ground and make a new start is most certainly a wise one.

R. I. C.—Your breeding stock must be badly infected with blackhead. As you are a subscriber to COMFORT, you will have had the October number, and in that I gave my method of treating breeding stock during the winter.

I am 24 years old, light hair and complexion and weigh 220 pounds.

SISSY.

CANADA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am writing to see if I can get help, turning to the only friend I know.

I am a homesteader's wife. We have four small children, ages ten, eleven, twelve, girls and a boy of fourteen. My husband was in France fourteen months with the American Army and he has never been strong since he came back. He works very hard but we can barely make a living. Our home is of logs. We have no flour, and it is a hard life but we are out of debt although for weeks we have lived on bread and tea and not had one other thing to eat. This is my problem. How can one earn a bit of money at home? We are all in need of clothes and shoes and for two years I've not had fifty cents to spend. Most of our clothes are made of flour sacks. We are 24 miles from the railroad and one and one-half miles from postoffice. Please, Mrs. Wilkinson, print this. Perhaps someone can tell me how I can make a little money at home. I will leave my address with you. A MOTHER IN NEED.

Soak ink stains in sour milk. If a dark stain remains, rinse in a weak solution of chloride of lime.

Soak blood stains in cold salt water, then wash in warm water with plenty of soap.

Saturate grass stains thoroughly with kerosene, then put in the washtub.

Wash iodine stains with alcohol, then rinse with soapy water.

To remove hot tea and coffee stains, soak the stained fabric in cold water, wring, spread out and pour a few drops of glycerine on each spot. Let stand for several hours, then wash with cold water and soap.

Soak iron rust stains thoroughly with lemon juice, sprinkle with salt and bleach for several hours in the sun.

Hot water and soap generally remove grease spots.

Soften pitch, wheel grease or tar stains with lard and soak with turpentine. Scrape off all the loose surface dirt with a knife, sponge clean with turpentine and rub gently until dry.

Soak mildew in a weak solution of chloride of lime for several hours. Rinse in cold water.

Rub sewing machine oil stains with lard, let stand for several hours and wash with cold water and soap.

To remove scorch stains, wet the scorched place, rub with soap and bleach in the sun.

Wash chocolate and cocoa stains with soap in tepid water.

To remove fruit stains, stretch the fabric over the mouth of a basin and pour boiling water over the stain. In cold weather fruit stains can be removed by hanging the stained fabric out of doors over night. If the stain has been fixed by time, soak the article in a weak solution of oxalic acid or hold the spot over sulphur fumes.

If varnish or paint stains are on a coarse fabric, dissolve by saturating with turpentine. Use alcohol on a fine fabric. Sponge with chloroform if a dark ring is left by the turpentine. Be very cautious not to use either chloroform or turpentine near a fire or artificial light.

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, make chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for raisers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientifically prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do—to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by this guarantee.

Sweet Grass Sewing Set

THIS attractive Sewing Set is the handiwork of the St. Regis Indians. They gather the fragrant sweet grass that grows so luxuriantly in the St. Lawrence Valley and from it weave the most beautiful baskets, jardinieres, fern dishes, centerpieces, table mats, vases, sewing sets, etc., doing the work entirely by hand, the only tool used being an ordinary knife.

Not only are these baskets and other articles very useful and ornamental but there is an indescribable charm in the delightful fragrance of the sweet grass from which they are made—a fragrance that is practically everlasting.

In this handsome sweet grass Sewing Set are a Scissors case, Thimble case and needle and pincushion. These are all tastily arranged and fastened together with pink silk baby ribbon as shown in the illustration. The ends of the ribbons are tied in a dainty bow, into which is sewed a white ivory ring, so that the complete Set can be hung on the wall or suspended from the sewing table, mantelpiece or chandelier.

We will make you a present of this useful and beautiful sweet grass Sewing Set if you will accept the following special offer:

Given To You! For a club of only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this sweet grass Sewing Set, exactly as above described, free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 1252.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

GOOD morning, Girls! (It is only 5 A. M. and I want you to know that I am an early riser—this morning, anyway.) I hope you are feeling as Thanksgivingy as I am, even though there is a heap of work ahead of me, dishwashing, sweeping and suchlike. Of course you girls are really "work" but it is impossible to feel that way toward you because your letters are saved until the last, so to have something good then, just as I used to save the raisins from my boiled rice when I was a child. In fact, you girls are the raisins in my boiled rice existence. That isn't very poetical but after breakfast I can think of something better. Just now I'm hungry, but not so hungry that I can't remember this poem of Will Carleton's:

"We thank Thee, O Father, for all that is bright—
The gleam of the day and the stars of the night,
The flowers of our youth and the fruits of our prime,
And the blessings that march down the pathway of time.

"We thank Thee, O Father, for all that is drear—
The sob of the tempest, the flow of the tear;
For never in blindness, and never in vain,
Thy mercy permitted a sorrow or pain.

"We thank Thee, O Father of all, for the power
Of aiding each other in life's darkest hour;
The generous heart, and the bountiful hand
And all the soul-help that sad souls understand.

"We thank Thee, O Father, for days yet to be;
For hopes that our future will call us to Thee.
Let all our eternity form, through Thy love,
One Thanksgiving Day in the mansions above."

TROUBLED TOPSY, W. Va.—If you still love him after the way he has treated you and forgive and forget it, make up with him. It won't be so unfair to the other fellow to give him up as it would be to marry him when you love another. Don't worry about "ruining" his life, men don't ruin so easily unless they want to. It seems that you would be happier to forget the first one and let yourself love the second, or, better still, forget both of them and hope for better luck next. In any case, think well befor marrying No. 1. He doesn't appear particularly solicitious of your happiness and that doesn't promise much for the future. Usually they don't get that way until after marriage.

BLACK EYES, Wash.—Don't do anything. Read answer to Marie of Oklahoma regarding parental objection. It's up to him to overcome it if he can.

WAITING, N. C.—Be nice to him but no nicer than to any of your boy friends. Perhaps when he sees that you are more or less indifferent he will put a little more pep into his courting.

VELMA, Sunshine State.—So glad you like me and my advice. I may say in return that a sensible letter from a sensible girl doesn't offend me any, either. (P. S. Other Cousins: I'm not calling Velma "sensible" because she likes me, but because of other things in her letter, such as appreciating her father's goodness to her, doing the housework since her mother's death, not using paint but staying out of doors and letting Nature and good health do it for you, etc., etc. That's what I call sensible.)

MRS. SADIE, Oklahoma.—I've sent your letter to Katherine Booth. Read what she says about being beautiful. Being plain myself, I have to content myself with the old adage, "Handsome is as handsome does." It helps some.

BILLY OF GREENWOOD.—Should you let a boy kiss you, and how can you tell whether or not he loves you? I've advised against kissing, unless engaged, and then in moderation, so don't allow it at all and see how he takes it. If he continues to be as attentive it would seem that he cares for you. If he gets cross about it and doesn't come to see you any more, his love wasn't very sincere. This isn't an infallible rule but it works sometimes.

MARIE, Oklahoma.—My dear, don't meet this young man at your sister's home or any other place. You are too young to have a sweetheart, anyway, and when you are old enough to have one I hope you will have sense enough to choose a man and not a cowardly boy. A real man, knowing your father didn't approve of him, would have had it out with him and proved that he was all right and worthy of you. Yes, I do think that boys grow tired of the girls they can kiss whenever they want to. It's only human nature to want what we can't get and when we can get it, not to want it, and men are the human-naturest things I ever knew. You won't find that word in the dictionary, so don't look.

BROWN EYES FROM WIRTZ.—The quickest way to get over being in love with a boy you've never met is to get acquainted with him. Just because he is handsome doesn't mean you would like him, unless you want to put him on the shelf and tie a pink ribbon on him. It often happens that good looks cover, but do not hide, a multitude of mean qualities. Chances are you've forgotten about him by this time.

FLORENCE, Alabama.—Never mind if you are "back in your grades." Study and then study some more until you are up with your class. You'll never be any younger and the longer you wait the more keenly you will feel the difference between your age and the ages of your classmates. The fact that you realize the need of an education is half the battle won. You'll work all the harder because of it. (2) You were right but I don't like the expression, "something to blow about." There are better ways of expressing yourself. I'm not so careful as I should be, I know, but you must be. Your writing is particularly good. Wish I could write as well.

HURT FEELINGS, New York.—If he took other girls to shows and otherwise spent money on them but took you for one street car ride only, in three years' time, it looks as if he wasn't so very keen about you, so why bother with him? I can't call him stingy and you shouldn't have done so. Why should he spend his good money on you when there are many other girls he, apparently, likes better? Of course, if he had been calling on you steadily and keeping other fellows away, it would be different. Anyway, if your friendship for him is as "deep" as you say it is, it would seem that you would enjoy a quiet conversation at home with him rather than going for a show—or did you mean deep in his pockets? If a girl is clever and really wants to impress a fellow, home is the best place in which to do it. In spite of their propensity to wander afield, and afar, men, at heart, are home-loving animals, and a nicely served lunch, or something cooked in chafing dish, appeals to them. After the man's little tummy is filled, and the dishes are cleared away and the girl sits down to embroider, and listens to him talk to her, he begins to feel very domestic and before he knows it is in so deep that the next day he is buying the engagement ring. Then, too, there is less competition at home for the rather plain girl. If you really care for him, I'm afraid you've ruined your chances with him.

H. L. A. W., Va.—That's a poor alibi. Evidently he is the sort of person who tries to square his conscience by blaming someone else, when all the time he knows he is in the wrong. I'm glad you did meet him with "head thrown back," when he was with another girl after promising to wait for you. What did he expect you to do—meach along as if you had done something you were ashamed of? That was no excuse for his behavior. He should have excused himself and left the other girl when you came. He didn't, but don't let him make you think it was your fault. Forgive him, of course, for I judge it is more or less youthful stubbornness. Doubtless he will outgrow such childishness and develop into a worthwhile man. Then will be time enough for you to consider him seriously if you feel that way; in the meantime you have your studies, and studies are heaps more important than boys. Let this teach you to meet the real adversities of life with head up, literally and figuratively speaking. Misfortune does not seem so overwhelming if faced bravely.

L. L. B., New York, N. Y.—I'm not an authority of matters of etiquette but believe it would be better if you didn't send him a Christmas present. He may have no intention of sending you a gift and it would be embarrassing for both if he has to scurry around, at the eleventh hour, and get something for you, after receiving your present. Wait and see what he does and if he gives you something and you want to make him a present, let it be for his birthday. Men like to be remembered on their birthdays. They don't mind birthdays the way women do. I'm taking it for granted that your correspondence is merely a friendly one, as it should be. Nine years, particularly the years between childhood and manhood, bring many changes and because you played together as children is no sign you'd be congenial now. Don't get serious until you have an opportunity of becoming better acquainted as your present selves. (2) I'm a friendly sort of person and quite likely to wave at a friend when he has waved to me, but if it would make me conspicuous in public I don't believe I'd do it. You have to use your judgment but it is always a safe rule to refrain from anything in public that calls attention to yourself.

MARY, Texas.—My advice is: "Don't marry." If he cared for you he would be willing to wait until you were old enough to be married and if he cared very much do you think he would go around with other girls? I don't. You have a good home, stay there.

SNAPDRAGON, Arkansas.—My goodness, child, I can't keep you informed as to the latest slang. I don't really approve of it, anyway, and if I did, slang that might be the ladybug's petticoat at the time I wrote it, would be out of use by the time it reached you. It takes quite a while to print and mail COMFORT, you must remember.

Sorry not to have answered more letters but the poem took up a lot of space. It's worth it, though. Read it again.

COUSIN MARION.

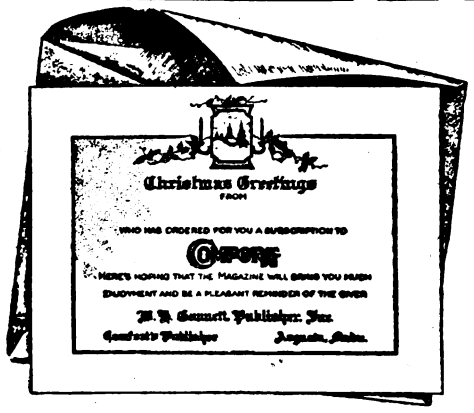
Remedies

TO REDUCE FEVER.—Bathe patient with solution of water and soda, three or four tablespoons of soda to two quarts of warm water.

To stop flow of blood from wound, bind on dry baking soda. This saved our little boy's life when he cut an artery in his foot.

TO REMOVE WARTS.—Keep warts saturated with grease fried from salt pork.—MOTHER OF SIX, Wyo.

PILES.—Steep three tablespoons of Jimpson (Jamestown) leaves in one cup of boiling water. Strain and put the liquid in pan with one tablespoon of lard; cook until liquid evaporates. Use salve frequently.



BOILS.—Make a paste of wheat flour and sorghum syrup and bind on boil. This will draw boil to a head but does not hurt the least bit.

ITCH.—Take equal parts sulphur and powdered alum and enough lard to make a salve. Apply for two nights then wash off with plenty of good soapy water and apply again. Three applications almost always cures. If not, take a bath and apply again.

CROUP.—Mix sorghum molasses, one teaspoonful and one-quarter teaspoon soda together, warm and give every hour until relieved. This is for common croup. This dose is for a child two or three years old. For younger children give proportionately smaller doses. Hope these remedies will help some mothers as I know they are sure cures, as I have seen them used successfully.—MRS. F. B. AULTMAN, Dustin, Okla.

nature is never satisfied until one has a contented mind. And how may one have a contented mind?

There are five things in life which will give one a contented mind. They are: the love of God, good health, honesty, morality and the willingness to do something toward bringing happiness into the lives of others. The question arises, "Are these things easily acquired?" If one believes in God, they are more easily acquired. If children are brought up to be strictly honest, honesty becomes a part of their lives. So it is with morality. In order to be really happy, one must possess every one of the above named characteristics, but so few people possess one of the most important of these traits of character—the willingness to do something to spread more sunshine into the lives of others, particularly little children.

Some seem to think that if they were rich they would be supremely happy. If money brought happiness, all the millionaires would be a lot of happy folks. It is not wealth which makes one happy, But it is the good we do with our money, and the kind words of cheer we give to others which brings lasting happiness.

Have you a few kind words and a few extra pennies for the newsboy who brings your paper—those of you who live in a city? Are you spreading words of cheer among your fellowmen, or are you a crank, handling out caustic words that sting?

Kindness is the oil which oils the wheels of industry, business and our social life. It is an essential to our growth and development as pure food, air, water and sunshine.

What is life, anyway? Doesn't it consist of service to others? And one of the greatest services one can perform in doing good in any way one wishes to; another great service which one can perform is providing a good home for some poor orphan and giving the child an education.

Before closing this letter, I must say a few kind words in memory of our dear Uucle Charlie, whose life was spent in the service of making ohers happy; and he didn't have to wait to go to heaven before receiving his reward; didn't he reap the richest reward a person can reap right here on earth—the friendship and loyalty of millions of his readers? Hasn't he erected the greatest monument to his memory by the good deeds of kindness, and the millions of loyal friends he has made?

Loyal friends! Can any one ask for a richer reward? A better monument? Of what lasting benefit to humanity is a marble monument? But his monument of good and noble deeds; and his loving kindness and sympathy for the sick and afflicted is a beautiful memory—a memory enshrined in the hearts of his friends, which will live forever.

May God, the giver of every good and perfect gift, bestow His richest blessings upon Uncle Lisha who is following in the footsteps of our dear Uncle Charlie, whose spirit still lives and which spirit is an inspiration to all to strive to live for others; and may He direct our paths so that we may walk in the "straight and narrow path which leads to eternal life"—and happiness.

Sincerely, ROY R. SMITH.

Thanks for both the words and the spirit of your good letter, Roy. It is so easy and happy a thing to be kind! Yet so many have never found this out. Locked more rigidly than any prison bars in a narrow cell of selfish personality, many unhappy and darkened lives are lived—if living it can be called. Lessons must be learned, now or later, if release is to come for those who are so self-bound. To know that we receive only as we give; to understand that we are each a part of a Great Whole and an "increasing purpose"; to live so that we serve and are not always served—these are the ways, as I believe you know, which give us life and give it more abundantly.

Roy, the happiest thing in the world is to make others so; the saddest thing is to look upon unseeing eyes, unhearing ears and the hearts that are turned inward, not outward. "Love one another!" is the old, the Great Command.

Thanks for your words about Uncle Charlie, Roy. I always remember this stanza of Coleridge when I think of my friend and our League's founder:

"Greatness and goodness are not means, but ends!
Hath he not always treasures, always friends,
The good, great man? Three treasures,—love and light,
And calm thoughts, regular as infants' breath;
And three firm friends, more sure than day and night,— Himself, his Maker and the angel Death."

WICOMICO H., NORTHUMBERLAND CO., VA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I just made up my mind to write. I am a girl of ten. I live on a farm. I am in the fifth grade. This letter I suppose will be thrown in the waste-basket, for I know it is not good enough to be printed.

I am always glad to get COMFORT. I love to hear from the other cousins. I am sorry I waited so long before writing. It has been awful hot where I live this summer.

Oh, I forgot to tell you how I look: I am a large girl with dark hair and dark eyes. My teacher last year was Miss Brann.

I am getting tired and sleepy now from writing. I guess I will close.

Your niece, HILDA KENT.

Hilda, I am so glad you made up your mind to write. This is an important thing—the being able to make up one's mind. Some folks go about with their minds all untied and untidy, and with corners of careless thoughts and undone deeds sticking out all over. Always keep your mind properly made up, Hilda, and all your brain furniture well swept and dusted. Then you will be a good mental housekeeper and get all your work done much more easily—whether you are in the fifth grade or the fiftieth.

You were so tired and sleepy and cut your letter so short, Hilda, that you left us in strange doubt about your size. You say you are a "large girl," and I have been wondering just how large you may mean. You may weigh seventy pounds—or more than seven hundred. I think you had better make up your mind to write again, Hilda, and tell us the real facts—no matter how big and terrible they may be. Surely you cannot weigh more than half a ton at ten years of age. But we will all love you just the same, even if you weigh more than this and have to make up your mind with a motor truck.

HENRYVILLE, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I hope the cousins will forgive me for not answering all their letters, when I say that the Henryville mail got such a boost the oldest postmaster could not remember a parallel. There were about 1,500 letters, from all parts of the U. S., which came rolling into this prettiest spot in Tennessee after my letter was published in COMFORT.

I have been reading Cousin Gus Trick's letter, and I suppose I rank next to him in popularity—or notoriety—among the fair sex of COMFORT'S cousins. Listen here, Cousin Gus: It's no wonder you got such a hail-storm of missives from fluttering butterflies, so to speak, when you came at them with a "death to the powder puff" sentence. Now let me tell the girls what another boy thinks about that much-discussed weapon of the toilet tools: I say let girls have all the powder they want and don't say a word about it, but I hope the time will come when they will not use too much, and will not paint at all—unless, of course, they want to get a job painting signs, etc. Then it would be all right. I have never heard a fellow say that paint improved a girl's looks, but have heard many say they could not see why so many girls used it—when it always made them look ridiculous. Why, not very long ago I saw a girl with paint on her nose and chin—and it was not accidentally put there, either!

As for the boys, they are worse in their extremes than the girls, so far as I can tell; but most of them are so stubborn that talking about it does not do any good. Sure, we know it is as bad for a boy to smoke cigarettes as it is for a girl, but what girl wants to puff them just because so many boys do?

Over a thousand girls wrote for my photograph, but you all know it would be impossible for me to comply with the request. I will say that the 1,500 who guessed at my age all missed it but two or three; I am twenty-three years of age.

As I said that I had been a wanderer, I shall tell a bit of this, although my letter is already too long: In early June of 1919 I left home (because I thought "somewhere else" was better than home) to go into the book agency business. I went to Nashville, Tenn., then to Roanoke, Va., and then south of Roanoke thirty miles to Rockymount, Va., where I remained about four months. I did not clear very much cash there, so started East, sightseeing. I visited the capital of our glorious land, saw the White House, the Washington monument, National and Smithsonian museums, and various other places of interest. I went from Washington to Toledo, O., where I remained for about six months, working in a great car factory. I returned home in the spring of 1920 and have not gone forth since and do not desire to go again. I got enough. But I learned more of the ways of the world that I never knew. My experiences I value very highly, but I do not advise other boys to do as I did. "To stay at home" is best, after all.

With best wishes to Uncle and the cousins,

FRANK CLARK.

Frank, we are all glad to have word of you and what you had been doing toward swamping the Henryville postoffice. I don't blame you a bit for not wanting to have over a hundred dozen photographs taken to distribute among your correspondents. You might settle this to a certain extent by sending on a Grand Cabinet Imperial, carefully packed, and showing you in your best light and broadest smile. I'll have Bill look the picture over and deliver his opinion before he puts it in his album. Of course you may not be as handsome as Cousin Wilmer D. Sweet, but that could not be expected, perhaps. But I'll wager you can stand a judicious inspection, such as Bill will give. I must warn you, however, that he is no flatterer, particularly on damp days and when the wind is in the east. So if you have pulchritudinous doubts and fears, you had better not send on any big daguerreotype.

I liked your letter, Frank; it gave me a more pleasant impression than cold type can give, I fancy. You were younger when you started your wanderings away from the "prettiest spot in Tennessee." Probably you did not list it as so beautiful when you headed for Nashville! The heart of a boy, Frank, is always rightly ready for loving, dreaming and roving—and the three go together, I think. But after fair wind and free road, it is good to be able to come back again and learn that "homekeeping hearts are happiest." Sights and scenes and friends we love, Frank, are the chief ends that life can give us, the ends to which all else are but diverse ways. When we have gathered these together around us, we have done all we can to make any and all of our years happy and worthwhile. Let youth wander as wander it must, but grant it always a home and a heart or two to be waiting when the roving is over. I think your letter tells me you have these.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for November

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Daniel O. Shaller, Orwigsburg, Pa. Badly handicapped in a struggle to live by an ununited fracture of his left leg, this suffering man asks financial aid. A. McClinton, Trenton, Ga. An old COMFORT subscriber now a shut-in for the past thirteen years. Believing he has not much longer to live, this aged friend and cousin asks that other COMFORT friends give him a shower of letters. Miss Judy Joyce, Smith, N. C. With a crippled mother and blind father, this woman fights for the livelihood of the family. She asks for clothing and any other aid or cheer. Elmer Bierd, Charles City, Ia. This is the appeal of a boy of fifteen. He is afflicted with lung trouble and rheumatism and his father died three years ago. He asks for cash to buy winter clothing. L. C. Pearse, Luverne, Ala. A cripple with deformities of hands and feet, this unfortunate man has been getting about with a crutch and fighting bravely to support himself. Now weakness and older years come on and he asks for help in his struggle. Mrs. Mattie E. Leake, Spencer, Va. A widow who in constant ill health has still to work to support herself and child. Clothing or cash will be welcome help in her fight.

Make it as happy a Thanksgiving as you can, cousins, for these shut-ins and needy ones. Show them that unfortunate and suffering as they are, there is still a depth of kindness in the world which can give their sad hearts true cause for thanks and praise. Help is most needed now as winter draws near and the months approach most difficult for shut-ins to endure.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7625.

President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes "Kept Us out of War" Last Fall

THE recent crisis in European affairs precipitated by the come-back of Turkey presents a notable confirmation of the familiar adage that "History repeats itself," but in its contact with American interests this repetition encountered a remarkable transposition of the principal actors on this side of the Atlantic and effected a most important result exactly opposite to that produced in the previous instance

Six years ago, in the fall of 1916, Woodrow Wilson, then President, was running for reelection and the never-to-be-forgotten slogan of his appeal for votes was that "He kept us out of war"- meaning the World War which had been raging since the first of August, 1914. Charles Evans Hughes, our present Secretary of State, was then the opposing candidate for president. Former President Roosevelt, in supporting the candidacy of Mr. Hughes, severely criticized Mr. Wilson's foreign policy of "watchful waiting" conjoined with opposition to putting the country in a condition of preparadeness for defense, a combination which Mr Roosevelt warned would surely draw us into the war, and in a costly and dangerous state of unpreparedness. It will be remembered that Mr. Wilson and his supporters met this issue by telling the people, who for the most part were strongly in favor of peace, that the election of Mr. Hughes would mean plunging this country into the war and that they must choose accordingly when they came to vote. So it was the hopeful promise of peace implied in the slogan, "He kept us out of war", that reelected Mr. Wilson in November, 1916. But Mr. Roosevelt's prediction was shortly fulfilled, for in less than five months after the election we were actually in the war pursuant to President Wilson's urgent request to Congress at a special session called by him for the purpose of obtaining the requisite authority and means to fight Germany. These are undisputed, historic facts which I mention, without comment, merely because they lead up to, and have a bearing on, the present situation.

Last September our Government again faced the necessity of deciding whether or not it should involve the United States in war in an effort to resolve another disastrous imbroglio of Old World affairs. The shocking atrocities inflicted on the Christian subjects of the Sultan in Asia Minor and especially in connection with the burning and pillaging of the Christian and Jewish quarters of Smyrna, following the overwhelming defeat of the Greek expeditionary army by the Turks, excited righteous indignation in America to such a pitch that President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes were deluged with thousands of letters and petitions urging that the United States undertake a so-called "holy war" against Turkey for the liberation of the Christian peoples in the Ottoman Empire from the tyranny of their Turkish rulers. These letters and petitions were largely from religious bodies, clergymen, missionaries and other well-meaning but sentimental people whose emotions had got the better of their judgment. Some of them, although less extreme in their demands, insisted that our Government at least resort to a naval demonstration and threat of war.

Fully cognizant of the grave consequences portended by such requested action President Harding and Secretary Hughes, with sound judgment, and strong in their sense of duty to the country, refused to be swept off their feet even by such a tidal wave of public sentiment, and stood steadfast in their determination to keep us out of war when and where our national rights, obligations or honor are not at stake.

Secretary Hughes Explains Our Attitude toward Turkey

In discussing the foreign policy of President Harding's administration, in a recent speech, Secretary of State Hughes explained our Government's attitude and action regarding the problems presented by the sudden resurrection and extension of Turkish power, as follows:

"The most acute questions at the moment concern the Near East. The Christian world has been filled with horror at the atrocities committed in Anatolia [a general name for Asiatic Turkey] especially in connection with the burning of Smyrna, rivaled only by the wholesale massacres and deportations of the Armenians in 1915. While nothing can excuse in the slightest degree or palliate the acts of barbaric cruelty of the Turks, no just appraisement can be made of the situation which fails to take account of the incursion of the Greek army in Anatolia, of the war there waged, and of the terrible incidents of the retreat of that army, in the burning of towns, and general devastation and cruelties.

"We have not failed to voice American sentiment in our abhorrence of these cruelties practiced upon helpless populations. Our American high commissioner at Constantinople, during the past year and a half, has not failed repeatedly and vigorously to protest against them.

"In the appalling distress at Smyrna, American officers were the first to give, and continued to give all the relief within their power, and from that moment we have lost no opportunity to succor the refugees by measures which have been rapidly and constantly broadening to meet the exigency in every practicable way. Our representatives have been instrumental in effecting the evacuation from Smyrna of nearly 200,000 refugees.

"It is easy to talk of prevention after the event. The fact is that these latest occurrences have been the immediate result of a state of war and we were not parties to that war. When the Allies were at war with Turkey and we associated ourselves with the Allies in the war with Germany and Austria-Hungary, we declined to go to war with Turkey despite the occurrences of 1915. In the last two years, with armies in Asia Minor, the appeal has been to force, and the American people would never have been willing to shoulder this burden of armed intervention which the Allies with their forces nearer the scene were unwilling to bear."

We Make No Idle Threats

"It would," continued Mr. Hughes, "be equally futile now to talk of this country going to war when all the other Powers are arranging to make peace. At no time has the Executive had any authority to plunge this country into war, even a holy war. I know there are those who think we should have threatened even if we did not intend to make war. The Administration does not make threats which it does not purpose to carry out. The American people cannot afford a policy where the words spoken on their behalf do not mean all that is said, and when we threaten we shall execute.

"In the present exigency, in addition to the full measure of relief which the American people are giving, there are American interests which must be adequately protected and humanitarian interests which should have our support in every proper way. I cannot discuss these in detail tonight but I may mention the protection of American citizens in Turkey, the conserving with their just rights of our educational, philanthropic and religious institutions, the safeguarding of American commercial interests, the freedom of the Straits [connecting the Mediterranean and Black seas] in the interest of commerce and equal opportunity, and the protection of minorities.

"As we are not at war with Turkey, we are not appropriately parties to the peace negotiations which are about to take place. While we have American interests to protect, these are not associated with the political ambitions of European Powers which have made the Near East a checkerboard for diplomatic play. We do not propose to connect ourselves with these rivalries, as such a connection would only confuse our aims with those of others, and obscure our clear and s... poses. When the Christmas Tree Burned

I.

THREE old ladies sat at one of the windows of the "Silverton Street Home for the Aged," their crochet needles clicking busily. It was two weeks before Christmas, but already the Christmas spirit was upon the earth. Through falling snow people hurried carrying bundles of suggested Christmas presents and once a group passed by, struggling merrily with a Christmas tree.

"I say," began Mrs. Borden, as she watched the group with the tree until it passed out of sight, "you say that we don't have any Christmas here?"

"That's what I said," returned Mrs. White, shaking her gray head forlornly. "You see, Mrs. Borden, I don't think it's worth while to bother. I do s'pose if someone wanted to make a Christmas for us, she'd not object. But we, old, worn-out critters, our days for Christmas celebrating is gone, I think."

"Oh, I don't think so!" exclaimed Mrs. Borden, her eyes sparkling brightly, "I don't think we're any too old to celebrate Christmas, and if it only means that someone's got to get a Christmas for us, well, I'm not afraid to say it."

"Ain't got any of us any money to speak of," began Mrs. Twikker.

"Aren't the Christmases on which most money is spent that are happiest," returned Mrs. Borden. "Remember once I took Master Bert to a Christmas party at a great big house where they had a Christmas tree as big nearly as a telegraph pole and the presents those children got! One little girl got a doll bigger than herself—but of course, appreciative children, I never saw a worse lot than they were——" Mrs. Borden stopped suddenly.

"Do go on and tell us all about it, Mrs. Borden," begged Mrs. White.

"Oh, you must excuse me. I don't like to talk of the past. It—it sort of saddens me and makes me feel what an ungrateful creature I was. For, truly, what I did I thought was for the best."

There was a certain amount of mystery about Mrs. Letitia Borden. She never spoke of her past except in unguarded moments like the present, nor did she make any reference to the past, though when she sometimes unintentionally did, that fact alone indicated that her life had been spent among the affluent and social elect.

The old ladies of the Silverton Street Home felt themselves entitled to hold up their heads for they were not the common variety of pauper. To the Silverton Home, one had to bring with him at least two hundred dollars which was turned over to the home in return for its agreement to take care of the applicant for the rest of life. Therefore the old ladies, having entered the home on this basis, often let their imaginations run away with them, and had they actually been transplanted to the past of which they unconsciously and gently bragged, they would have recognized it, so differently had their memories pictured it.

Mrs. Borden was not guilty of this sin of unconscious exaggeration, and while she came from another state to enter the home, her conversation indicated that in the past she had lived in a great city in which the Home was located. After her last "break," Mrs. Borden sat silent for a while. But presently the sad little lines that had formed out of her face and her cheeks, which were strangely smooth for one of her age, glowed with enthusiasm.

"I'll tell you what, Mrs. White and Mrs. Twikker! Let's three get up a Christmas Eve surprise party for our sisters here! We'll work hard and secretly and make up some present for everyone in the Home. We can make caps and aprons and things of little things like that. Then we can trim with all the packages on a tree and if we string up yards and yards of pop-corn, that will fill up between the presents. Maybe we can buy a dozen or so of tinsely things to make the tree sparkle and it will be just grand! We can ask Mrs. Twikker, all he said, to distribute the gifts and call out the names."

"Regarding our pres," interrupted Mrs. Twikker, "and some of the rivalries bet ladies here do get little presents and we can political antag Mrs. Fortesque to give them to us to hang will discard presents to each other, Mrs. Fortesque can on the tree so that we'll get as many presents as Hughes's secretary, too." possible, and if any of the ladies are going to easily get them for us so we can put them on

"In two whole weeks, we can do a whole lot," agreed Mrs. White to the sum total of plans.

"Let's start right in," enthused Mrs. Borden. "I've got lots of cloth and lace for caps and aprons. And tomorrow I think I'll go downtown and get some ornaments for the tree."

Mrs. Borden arose from her chair and invited the other two to her room, and getting down before her "bureau," she took therefrom various odds and ends for the contemplated caps. Secretary Hughes have it to old ladies to properly value fabric! Little had Mrs. Borden come by such excellent material?

"Why don't you tell us something about your plans, Mrs. Borden? You've been here nearly two months and nary a word have you told."

But all Mrs. Borden did was to look with a reproachful longing at the speaker, and Mrs. Twikker did not repeat her request. Anon, however (such was Mrs. Borden's cheerful nature), the cheerful-ness came back to her eyes and the Christmas preparations commenced.

How wonderful it all was! Especially to Mrs. Borden and Mrs. Twikker who had believed that nothing had been left for them but stoic acceptance of life until fate cut the thread that would release their mortal pilgrimage.

Each day, whenever they found time, they labored together, fashioning all sorts of gay little articles, making their presents purposely small so that there might be so many more to open. Fifty and one different little articles did they construct and their old hearts glowed with the peace of the Christmas spirit as they saw their store grow in size. As each little article was finished and wrapped and tied up with gay or silver or gold string, it meant another beam of happiness on their Christmas tree.

Mrs. Fortesque was taken into their confidence, and the good-natured matron was only too pleased to help, for the big-hearted woman loved her duties but had not the time to fuss over things that were strictly within her sphere of action.

Accordingly she helped with any details that were necessary, promised that the tree should be properly set up at the appointed time, and that the packages that came by mail would be put in her charge. She also gave permission to Mrs. Twikker to bake fancy cookies for the tree.

After the gifts were practically all prepared, and then the stringing of pop-corn, and when the morning preceding Christmas Eve came, Mrs. Twikker baked the fancy cookies, and they were all giggled up-stairs to the big front parlor where the tree had been set up.

That all the old ladies knew something was up was apparent, but they tried to appear unconscious, for if, after all, it wasn't for them, they would not be disappointed.

During the afternoon, when the wind was blustering about outside and plastering everything with snow in the true Christmas manner, the trio of conspirators stole up to the parlor and began that task that never fails to thrill, trimming a Christmas tree.

Mrs. Borden, from her meager store of money, had purchased some tinsel and colored Christmas tree rope, a few dozen glittering baubles, a few dozen candle holders and several boxes of brilliantly colored wax candles. With these, Mrs. Twikker's cookies, the presents and the pop-corn, the tree soon was loaded.

When it was done, the trio stood off to survey their work.

"Well, I must say it does look real handsome, and it will be the best Christmas party we ever had. Some of us'll get as many as five packages and that will be splendid. I do wish we could light it once before tonight just to see how it will look," said Mrs. Twikker.

The three women stood in the dimming twilight. The wild gusty wind outside shook the casement and hurled swirls of snow at it.

"Let's light it," urged Mrs. White.

"All right. Get some matches," Mrs. Borden said, and, the matches brought, she illumined one candle and with this she proceeded to light all the others.

A cry of delight escaped the trio.

"Go and tell Mrs. Fortesque to come and see how wonderful it is, Mrs. White," said Mrs. Borden, "and Mrs. Twikker, will you see if a few apples can be spared? I think it would fill up a little more."

Kind little Mrs. Borden only did this because she had some special little treats for her two colleagues and wished to hang them upon the tree without their knowledge.

The two women went off, and as soon as they were gone, Mrs. Borden stepped upon a chair and went to fastening the little gifts upon the tree.

Then—how it happened she never knew—she heard a crackling sound. Then suddenly an ominous brilliance and the delightful smell of burning balsam!

But the sweet odor came to Mrs. Borden like the breath of tragedy. The tree was on fire!

She looked at it in dumb consternation as she saw their efforts of weeks quickly disappearing before the devouring tongue of flame. Rooted to the spot, she stood there, helpless, while the fire burned and crackled, but when she saw it spread to the window curtains and drapes and saw it rapidly blackening the walls, she awoke to panic-stricken activity.

Seizing a rug, she thrashed at the tree, which temporarily smothered the flame but caused a blanket of smoke to rise. To the window she flew and threw up the sash, and with a howl of demoniac glee all outdoors rushed in, giving fresh impetus to the blaze which flared in a brilliant sheet behind her.

For a short second she stood, framed in the window against the glowing red, then her head spun, she reeled and sank to the floor, and the consciousness of an uproar in the streets drifted from her mind.

II.

The glare of the fire had attracted the attention of the few belated automobiles in the street, and one driver, driving a luxurious limousine, drew up to the curb and jumped out. Diving into the crowd of old women who had been hastily dressed for the street, and who now stood shivering and shrieking, he demanded to know if everyone had been gotten out safely.

"I'm sure I saw one old lady drop in that room!" he exclaimed.

"Oh, it was Mrs. Borden!" shrieked Mrs. Twikker, wringing her hands, "she was the last one in the parlor with the Christmas tree."

"She didn't get out then!" exclaimed the motorist.

"Oh, my God!" groaned Mrs. Fortesque.

"I'll go in!" the motorist exclaimed, throwing off his heavy fur coat and gauntlets which the trembling old women took from him, and he fled into the building and through the smoke-filled halls and rooms to the blazing up-stairs.

He groped around, and then, guiding himself by the location at which he saw the tragedy occur, he dashed into the room and right to the spot. He stumbled against something and reached down. It was clothes he touched—it was Mrs. Borden. Throwing his coat about her, and tying a handkerchief about his mouth, he staggered through the smoke and flame and finally reached the street just as the firemen commenced to play streams of water upon the blazing building.

He carried the little old woman to a neighboring house, and laid her upon a bed. The other old ladies crowded about, in the foreground Mrs. White and Mrs. Twikker.

"She ain't dead, is she?" queried Mrs. White tremblingly. She was just like sunshine in the home," and then quaveringly she told the story of the little Christmas surprise that Mrs. Borden had planned and which they had helped execute.

"And now our Christmas is all burned up," Mrs. Twikker and all the old ladies wailed in chorus, now that they knew the surprise had really been for them.

The young fellow had left Mrs. Borden to the mercies of Mrs. Fortesque, after phoning for a doctor.

At the continual mention of the name, "Borden," he turned to look at the woman whose life he had saved.

He thought he had just saved a charity patient. Now he gazed earnestly at the sweet face, with the closed eyes, resting on the pillow.

His own widened.

"Merciful heaven!" he breathed. "It's the old girl. I must take her right home with me!"

III

When Mrs. Borden awoke to real consciousness (she had, of course, been brought out of her syncopatic state), she found herself lying upon a bed of snowy whiteness in a room that to her bewildered mind seemed to glow with the light of heaven. The light glowed and sparkled upon walls of silver and hangings of old rose and soft gray.

Through the room there permeated that delicious smell which pervades a house only when a Christmas tree is set up therein.

She slowly raised herself on elbow, and now more than ever she wondered if indeed she were not in heaven, for distantly there came to her the words of that joyous carol:

"Oh, come, all ye faithful,
Joyful and triumphant,
Oh, come ye, oh, come ye
To Bethlehem!
Come and behold Him,
Born the King of angels,
Oh, come let us adore Him,
Oh, come let us adore Him,
Oh, come let us adore Him,
Christ—the Lord!"

Then came the sound of distant chimes.

"Am I in heaven?" thought the bewildered little creature, for the exquisite music (though rendered by a phonograph) seemed to indicate it.

Just then a fine little lad of about six entered the room and came to the bed.

"What—what does it mean? It can't be heaven for here is Master Bert, but he didn't die, he grew up to be a big man——"

"Hello, Merry Christmas, dear Mrs. Borden," the little fellow greeted. "Daddy said I should call you Nursie Jane, the way he used to."

"Call me Nursie Jane, the way he used to," Mrs. Borden repeated. "Why, what does it mean? Who are you, little man?"

The little fellow looked at her in astonishment. "Me? I'm Bertram St. Clare and I was named after my papa. And you're his Nursie Jane and you're coming to live here with us and take care of me and we're going to be good pals like you and daddy used to be."

"And is this your daddy's house?"

"Sure, Nursie Jane, and it's going to be your house, too."

"But how did I get here? There was a fire, I remember—or did I dream it——"

Poor Mrs. Borden was getting quite befuddled when the motorist, who had been quietly standing in the doorway, softly came forward.

Mrs. Borden looked at him.

"Bert, my darling Master Bert!" she cried, looking up at the sparkling eyes and teasing face, and seeing only the little lad whose steps she had guided from infancy. "Tell me what's happened."

"All right, old girl," he said, the title he had used for her after he had grown up, "but first I want you to meet Mrs. St. Clare, whom you will have to get to forgive you for your very ungrateful treatment of her," and he shook his finger at her teasingly.

Mrs. Borden colored, but her momentary embarrassment passed as Mrs. St. Clare came into the room and putting her arms about the old lady's neck she kissed her and said comfortingly:

"We want you to stay with us always, and if you run away we'll do something dreadful to you."

And as Mrs. Borden looked at the lovely face and form of the glorious girl who was far more wonderful than the pictures "Master Bert" had shown her, but felt the lashings of accusing conscience. But what she had done had been for the best, she thought.

"How did I get here, Master Bert?" she asked.

"How did you get here? Why, old girl, I'm quite a hero. I was passing the Silverton Street Home and saw it ablaze and I saw a woman (I didn't know it was you) apparently faint into the flames. So I rushed in, the way they do in the movies, and carried you out, and, lo, I found that I had rescued my old nurse. So, of course, I brought you here, and here you'll stay. You've got to obey me now. That being quite clear, tell me how you happen to be in an old ladies' home when I thought you comfortable and happy with your brother out in Nebraska?"

"Well, Master Bert, it was this way: When I knew you were going to be married, and you said that you wanted me to live with you, I didn't think I should because I feel that young people should be by themselves. You loved me so much and treated me like your mother almost, but I didn't know whether Miss Laurette (so she had always spoken of Mrs. St. Clare when she had been Laurette Montgomery) would care for me as you did, and I couldn't blame her because she didn't know me the way you did, and I thought perhaps she'd see in me nothing but a stupid old woman, and if she did, she would be perfectly justified because that's what I am, and I couldn't have the place in her heart that I had in yours. And I didn't want to be the cause of any trouble between you. I was terrible to think such thoughts of you, wasn't I, Miss Laurette?"

There were traces of tears in Laurette's eyes. "In a way, yes, because I knew you must be a good woman from Bert's praises of you, and he said how splendid it would be to have you with us in case we had children. And then again, on the other hand, I think you were very brave and self-sacrificing in not putting Bert to the test. Another person might not have been that thoughtful."

"I might have known Master Bert wouldn't marry any other kind of a girl than you are, dearie," Mrs. Borden said, grateful for the high compliment her actions had received.

"Well, so," she continued, "I went to my brother's home in Nebraska. Talk about relatives! But I guess I won't talk about them. Well, I lived with them for a while, in fact all the time until up to a less than a year ago—then I came to the Home."

"But why to the Home? Didn't you have plenty of money?"

Mrs. Borden's cheeks burned. "I guess I'll have to tell everything. You see, when I told you I wanted to live with my brother because he needed me, I had about seven or eight thousand dollars which you had invested so nicely for me. Well, my brother got a notion that he wanted to raise fancy cattle, and I cashed my investments. Well, he failed in everything and I didn't get anything and all I had left was five hundred dollars. So I went to the Home and paid them two hundred dollars and kept the balance to bury me."

"But why didn't you come to us? When Bert was born, I wrote to your brother in Nebraska and he said that you were happy where you were—that you hadn't much to do and that you weren't as strong as you used to be."

"Did he write that? I never heard from you, but I suppose he didn't want you to know that he had used my money."

"And all these years you might have been with us," said Bert. "Well, that's all over now, so we'll let you just forget all about it. Now, if you feel strong enough, get up and dress," and with the words, Bert, Mrs. St. Clare and the little lad left the room, Master Bert, however, remaining outside the closed door.

Mrs. Borden then offered up her morning prayer, then dressed in the pretty garments she found, they having been marked for her as Christmas gifts. Then she went out into the hall.

Master Bert was waiting for her, and placed his little hand in hers. As she took the soft, confiding little member into her own, she seemed to drift back through the years when she had thus held the lad's father's hand and guided his footsteps.

Master Bert helped her to the immense Christmas tree and loaded her down with presents that he said Santa Claus had left for her.

Poor Mrs. Borden was quite overcome, but suddenly her eyes grew sad.

"Dear me, Master Bert, Senior," addressing Bert's daddy, "I can't accept all these things. They, by rights, should go to all the ladies at the Home. Poor things, they won't have no Christmas. They lost it all on account of me, though how that tree caught fire is a mystery to me. Maybe it was my carelessness. And for that, here I am back with you again where I was always longing to be, and loaded down with presents and they maybe not having a roof over their heads."

She thought St. Clare looked at her queerly as he said:

"There wasn't such a dreadful lot of damage except to that one room and the damage done by the smoke. But don't you worry about them, nor fret. This is Christmas Day and I want you to be perfectly happy."

"I know——" she began, but he raised a warning finger.

"Don't worry. Christmas isn't over, yet."

So Mrs. Borden gave herself over to the wonders that had happened and to Master Bert Jr.'s toys, helping him to build houses of his blocks and winding up his mechanical toys to make them run, and as the two played together it was difficult to determine which was the greater child.

When the summons to dinner came, Bert led the old lady through the halls and to the dining-room and when Mrs. Borden entered, she rubbed her eyes as if she had been in a dream.

The room was gaily trimmed with Christmas greens and sparkling festoons of silver. In the center of the table a small, fully decorated Christmas tree stood. But this was not what made her stare. No, it was the sight of twenty-four old ladies seated around the table on which was spread a most tempting Christmas dinner, beginning with the big smoking geese and whole roasted little porkers with apples in their mouths down to plum pudding and other Christmas dainties.

"Surprise, Sister Borden! Surprise!" cried the old ladies.

But St. Clare and his wife escorted her to the head of the table and sat down on either side, while Master Bert had a seat between Mrs. White and Mrs. Twikker.

When she was seated, Mrs. Twikker arose.

"Sister Borden," she began, "we told Mr. St. Clare how it was you as thought of us old folks and decided to get up a Christmas for us, and didn't we groan when we saw it burning up. We thought that there was an end to it all, but this morning——!" She stopped, then commenced again:

"First thing this morning, it began like a story. A big buss automobile drove up to the Home and we were told to get on our things and take Christmas dinner here. And when we got here there was a big box for each of us, and while we can't open it until we get back, still we know there's many nice things for us in them. And the decorators came to the Home this morning so that everything'll be fixed up for us when we get back—that is, all but the room where the fire really was. So, I'm to thank you on behalf of all the sisters, Mr. St. Clare says, for no greater love hath man than he who gives up everything for his friends," Mrs. Twikker said, confusing somewhat the Scriptures, "and that is what you did because you thought it would be best for his happiness. If the Christmas tree hadn't burned he'd maybe never have found you. So he gives us this party, but it is you, not he, that's giving it, he says, and it's to take the place of the one that burned up. On behalf of the sisters, I thank you and wish you a Merry Christmas and many of them."

Mrs. Twikker sat down amid the applause of the gathered company and her confused speech wasn't one whit worse than many you and I have heard from people when called upon for an impromptu speech at a banquet!

There was a moment's pause then, after which Mr. St. Clare said:

"Nursie Jane, will you not pronounce grace?"

All bowed their heads.

And then Nursie Jane, in her sweet but quavering voice said:

"Dear God in Heaven, who doest all things for the best, bless, I pray Thee, this food. Bless and keep these more than kind people who have provided it, and whose loving kindness teaches us truly that man is made in Thy image. Bless each and every one of us who know that, though misfortune may seem to have fallen upon us, we are held in the hollow of Thy hand, and Thou lookest after us even as after the sparrow that falleth. Let us ever remember Thee, and thank Thee for the gift of Thy beloved Son who was born on Christmas Day. Amen."

PART II.

"PUT that down!" yelled Cody in a tone of voice that Deed's Cove settlers had long since learned to fear. "I've got something to say to this audience myself.

"I've been a yellow hound for five years—and this is where I start back tryin' to be human."

"That child," continued Cody, pointing to little Zach, "is mine, and I married Jane Stairs through trickery, but now I'm ready to claim her whenever she says the word—and I ain't going to stand by and see the same wrong done to Aaron Deed's gal——them that has somethin' to say agin' her, speak out—now—or hold yer peace."

"So say I," said chastened Warren Slayden. "Let's have the benediction."

Unnoticed save by a few, Mary had taken her baby from Jane and slipped from the church while Jim Cody was speaking; consequently she did not know what had taken place, but a few minutes later as she went down the slope towards the shore road she heard the sound of many voices calling her name. Glancing back, she caught sight of the people running from the church.

The thing she had done suddenly filled her soul with terror—not that she would undo it—her baby had a right to salvation—but could this crowd see it as she did? She must evade them some way—and she quickened her steps into a run.

The wind sang in her ears as she raced along the white shore road. She could not, nor did she try to distinguish what was being said by those behind her—she guessed the worst—and her one thought was to get out of their reach. Instead of turning back to her own cabin for refuge, she went straight towards the sea, and at the very landing where Sidney Creighton had come into her life, she sprang into the dilapidated old dory that Aaron Deed had used during his lifetime, and rowed fearlessly out upon the sunlit waters of Deed's Cove.

A hundred yards from shore she looked back at the shouting, gesticulating crowd that had followed her to the water's edge, and seeing Jim Cody jump into a boat she realized she was playing a losing game—he would soon overtake her.

"NO"—she shouted back—"the sea shall save me!" Then with a despairing cry, she flung her oars upon the water and rising to her feet with her baby clasped closely to her breast, she lifted her face heavenward and in solemn voice cried out: "God be merciful."

After two years abroad Zane Bradley came back to New York, hoping to drown his sorrow in work. At last he realized that no amount of wandering over the earth would ever wipe from his heart the image of Mary Deed.

Over and over had he blamed himself bitterly for having left her without an understanding, and the only thing that brought him any comfort whatever was the thought that she had won a worthy man.

The second day after his arrival Sidney dropped in for a little visit. Instantly Zane was alarmed over the change in his brother's appearance; the face that had once shone with only the joy of living was now marked with lines of anguish, and his temples were silver with gray hair.

Zane had always had a tender spot in his heart for this weaker brother, but never before had there been any sympathy for him. That Sidney had married for money was no secret to Zane, and having heard nothing from him since he was married, supposed that the boy had been happy enough to justify the act.

Calling his servant to bring in some refreshment, Zane dropped down beside his brother and began chatting pleasantly of the things and places he had visited abroad.

"Don't tell me about them," Sidney interrupted. "I've traveled till I hate the sight of a time-table."

"Not unhappy, kid?" Zane asked presently as he eyed Sidney closely.

"Bored to death," answered the younger brother, "absolutely bored to death—all I do is run about the world and drink pink tea."

"Surely that hasn't caused all these gray hairs!" laughed Zane.

Sidney shook his head. "Not that exactly—but I deserve every one I have."

"Not sick of married life?" asked Zane, trying to fathom out the secret of his brother's unhappiness.

"I'm paying for what I bargained for, Zane," Sidney answered thoughtfully, "but I've found out

CHAPTER I.

AN ENCOUNTER.

"BROWNIE! Brownie Douglas, wait a moment."

Time—three o'clock in the afternoon of the 5th of September, 1876.

Place—vestibule of the Memorial Hall, at the World's Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, when all the world did literally flock to behold the great sights in that city of brotherly love.

The speaker of the above sentence was a young lady of about twenty, tall, slender and of aristocratic bearing.

The person addressed was a bright little fairy, who looked not over sixteen, yet who in reality was two years older.

She turned quickly toward the aristocratic-looking lady who had spoken.

"What is it, Aspasia? I have been waiting for you. Where have you been?" she asked brightly.

"Oh, this is you, then? I thought that young lady just passing out was you—these linen dusters deceive one so."

"You look heated and weary; will you not sit down and rest?" asked Brownie Douglas, regarding the flushed face of her friend with an amused look in her dark, bright eyes.

There was never a greater contrast than between those two young ladies.

One tall, fair and languid and dressed in the height of fashion; covered with jewels, laces, flowers and furbelows, not to mention a three-quarters of a yard train, which, with the other fixings referred to, demanded so much of her attention that she could enjoy nothing of the wonders and beauties around her.

The other, petite and dainty; her glossy brown hair simply coiled at the back of her small head, which was crowned with a hat of dark straw, trimmed with a wreath of scarlet berries and shining dark green leaves. Her half-fitting linen ulster protected, while it did not wholly conceal her rich though simple dress of black silk, which just cleared the floor, and did not hide the "two mites of feet" incased in their tiny French boots. A pair of gray silk gloves covered her little hands and a simple linen collar was fastened at her delicate throat by a richly-carved spray of coral, her only visible ornament.

"Are you ready to go on now?" she asked her friend, as she saw the frown upon her brow fade out, at being once more set in moving order.

"Yes, but—— There! Oh, dear!"

Miss Douglas, who was about moving on, turned again at this cry of woe, and immediately a ripple of musical, irrepressible laughter broke from her scarlet lips.

There stood her friend in the act of gathering up her voluminous train, while directly behind her stood an unmistakable countryman, with one huge foot planted firmly upon the ruffles and plaitings of the beautiful skirt, securely pinning it to the floor, and making it optional with Miss Aspasia either to go on and leave behind her that (to her) very important appendage or wait until that herculean member should be removed.

The luckless, though innocent cause of this uncomfortable state of affairs, was gazing with wide eyes and open mouth at the figure of an Indian upon the trail opposite him, and wholly unconscious of the strong attachment which bound him to the fashionable belle.

"I beg your pardon," said Miss Douglas, hastening to the rescue, "but will you please lift your foot?"

"Eh? What? Oh, ya-as," ejaculated the clumsy but good-natured fellow. "I declare, miss, I never saw so many wimmen a-losin' their clo's off before. I hain't been nowhere today but somebody's dress has ben tumblin' off on 'em, and I've stepped on't. I sh'd hev a fit if 'twar me, and I'm tarnal glad I wur born to a pair o' breeches."

Miss Huntington colored angrily, and murmured something about "such insufferable insolence," whereupon the irrepressible countryman offered a piece of friendly advice.

"Granm'th'r 'd tell ye to sew it on stronger to the bindin'—put on a button and make a buttonhole. That's her way, and I don't believe she ever lost her petticoat in her life."

Having delivered himself of these pithy remarks, he moved away, and at this instant a suppressed laugh greeted Miss Brownie's ear. Looking up, she caught two pairs of mirth-gleaming eyes fixed upon herself and her unfortunate companion.

Two young men were standing near, and had been amused witnesses of the comical scene just described.

On being discovered, one of them lifted his hat and bowed low to Miss Douglas, who flushed a rosy red as she returned it, and who would instantly have burst into gleeful laughter had it not been for doing violence to her companion's feelings.

As it was, however, she linked her arm in Miss Huntington's and turned quickly away, but not before she had caught the look of unmistakable admiration with which the other gentleman regarded her.

"Who is she?" he asked eagerly of his companion, after he had watched her out of sight.

"That full-rigged craft, with all her sail crowded on, is Miss Aspasia Huntington, a Baltimore belle and heiress——"

"And the other?" interrupted the first speaker, somewhat impatiently.

"Is—hold on to your ears, my boy—Miss Mehetabel Douglas, of Philadelphia," was the startling announcement, accompanied with a smile of amusement.

"Thunder!"

"'Tis rather an imposing cognomen for such a dainty piece of flesh and blood, I admit."

"Her parents ought to be choked for giving her such a name."

"They are already defunct, and, I believe, in no way responsible for the obnoxious appellation."

"How so?"

"Her father died before she was born, and her mother at her birth; so the poor little waif fell to the tender mercies of a maiden great-aunt on her father's side, who immediately had her christened for herself, and proceeded forthwith to bring her up, after her own ideas, to inherit her million of money."

"But the other one called her Brownie?"

"Yes; no one could 'Mehetabel' that sprite. Her nurse called her Brownie from the first, on account of her eyes, hair and skin, for she was very dark as a child."

"Showed her good taste—the name just suits her," muttered the first speaker, absently.

"The little elf liked the pet name so well herself that she would never allow any one to call her anything else. I believe since she has grown up her schoolmates and a few of her gentlemen acquaintances, who do not feel familiar enough to address her so freely, shorten the obnoxious old maid title into 'Meta'."

"You seem to know all about her."

"Yes, my sisters are intimate with and very fond of her. As for myself, I always thought her a bewitching little fairy."

"She has the sweetest and brightest face in the world," was the enthusiastic reply.

"Ah, ha! Hard hit, aren't you, Dredmond?"

"So hard that I should like another of the same kind. Will you introduce me?"

"Certainly, the first opportunity."

"You say the old aunt is rich?"

"Immensely, and very aristocratic, too."

"Aristocratic, is she? The little one herself seems to be simple enough; she put on no airs. How civilly she spoke to that countryman."

"Oh, yes; she treats the rich and the poor alike. She has been very kind to some poor working girls whom I know, and yet she has a thus-far-and-no-farther way with her, when the occasion requires, which even your high blood could not overcome."

"There's fun in her, though; how her bright face dimpled and gleamed when that clown stood ballast for Miss Huntington. Douglas, I believe, was the name of the little one, was it not?"

"Yes."

"It is a good one with us."

"A good one! I guess it is, my boy. Why, Miss Mehetabel, the elder, claims to be a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility."

"Aha! is that so?"

"Yes, indeed; but I warn you if you go there not to bring up the subject of genealogy, for once started upon that topic, there is no whoa until she brings up with an ancient queen."

"Pshaw! you are talking gammon now," returned the young man impatiently.

"Indeed I am not. I have seen the genealogical tree, and I assure you she has as good blood flowing in her veins as you have, notwithstanding she has been an inhabitant of plebian America for nearly half a century."

"Well, well, Gordon, we won't quarrel about their ancestry; there is beauty enough there, let alone blue blood."

"Yes. But I think we have discussed the subject sufficiently. Shall we go over to Machinery Hall now?"

"Anywhere you choose; but stop! What have we here?"

Adrian Dredmond stooped and picked up the shining something upon which he had almost stepped as they turned to leave the place.

It proved to be a costly cuff button of black enamel and gold. Upon the face of it was a large D., studded with brilliants, while a tiny row of the same precious stones was set around the edge.

Turning it over, the young man discovered the word "Brownie" engraved in finest letters on the back.

"'Ye gods and little fishes,' Gordon! I've found a treasure!" and he held it up to view.

"Egad! that is so. That must have cost a cool hundred," exclaimed Gordon, examining it critically, then added: "You are in luck, my boy. It is a good omen to find something belonging to one whom you admire."

"Is it?"

"Yes; but I suppose torture would not compel you to give it up until you can put it into the owner's own little hands," and the young man laughed.

"You are right for once," returned Dredmond lightly, although with heightened color.

"It will give me a good excuse for seeking an introduction," he added, as he carefully tucked the button into his vest pocket.

Again Gordon laughed.

"Mark my words, Dredmond, something unusual will come of your finding that trinket."

"What makes you think so?"

"I don't know—it is a sudden impression, perhaps, but I believe it will have an influence on your future."

"You are superstitious," replied Dredmond, with a little scornful curl of his handsome lips.

"If it should result in your carrying Miss Brownie Douglas off to the old country with you, there would be a buzzing about your ears, I can tell you; for not a few have their eye fixed already upon the dainty elf with her golden pile in prospect."

"Are you among the number, Gordon?" asked his friend, with a keen glance at the young man.

"Not I, my boy; my star shines from another quarter," Gordon replied laughingly, though growing red in the face with the acknowledgment.

"I think then, my friend, you are getting up a little romance upon your own account, and without much of a foundation to begin with. If you were interested I should not wonder, but as there is no jealousy in the matter it seems a little singular that you should jump at conclusions thus. I fear, Gordon, I shall have to set you down as a masculine match-maker."

"Call me what you like, but I confess that I think you and that little fairy would suit each other wonderfully well. She is just the right kind of a little woman to make a——"

"Hush, my boy; do not reveal my secrets here," interrupted Adrian Dredmond, looking anxiously around.

"Well, well, come on then to Machinery Hall; but, Dredmond, I think you are over modest about some matters."

"It is a failing which will never harm anybody," the young man replied smiling; then linking arms in a friendly way with his companion, they wended their way to view that wonder of modern achievements, the Corliss engine, and those countless other inventions of the human brain.

CHAPTER II.

BROWNIE'S THOUGHTS.

In a luxurious apartment of a modern house on Chestnut Street, two hours after the incidents related in our first chapter, Miss Mehetabel Douglas, the senior, might have been seen sitting in a comfortable easy-chair, while Brownie sat upon an ottoman at her feet.

The former was a woman of about sixty-five years of age, with a delicate, high-bred face, surrounded by bands of soft, silvery hair. She had dark grey eyes, which always had a look in them as of some hope suddenly crushed out of her life, while a patient, gentle expression hovered about her thin, aristocratic lips.

Brownie had just been reading to her from "Patience Strong's Outings," and now they were talking it over together.

"Why is it, I wonder," said Brownie reflectively, "that so much sport is made of old maids?"

"I suppose because the theory prevails, that every old maid has failed to catch a husband, and is therefore a fit subject for ridicule," Miss Mehetabel returned, a little gleam of amusement lighting up her sad eyes.

"Pshaw! I know any number of people, who are no more fit to be wives and mothers than so many children; and yet every one has managed to secure a husband, while there are plenty of 'old maids' in the world, so patiently living out their lonely lives, who would make such strong, helpful wives, such wise and tender mothers. Now, auntie, you would have made such a splendid wife for some good man; and you ought to have had at least a dozen children. What a charming household it would have been, for you would have governed so wisely and so well. I don't believe nature ever intended you for an old maid."

A spasm of pain contracted the old lady's brow but she replied quietly:

"Perhaps not; yet there is, doubtless, some wise reason for it. What would have become of you, dear, if I had had a large family of my own?"

"Oh, I should have only made up the baker's dozen, and it seems such a pity that so much native talent should all be wasted upon one poor little waif like me," Brownie said with a little laugh.

"If I had had the number you assign me, dear, and they had all proved the blessing to me that you have been, I fear it would have been too much happiness for one human being; and yet——"

The old lady did not conclude her sentence, but heaved a deep sigh, while unshed tears stood in her beautiful eyes.

"Auntie, why were you an old maid? I don't understand it—it must have been no one's fault but your own."

"My own fault, Brownie! You don't know—child, you don't know," cried Miss Mehetabel sharply, while a deep, dry sob that was almost a groan burst from her lips.

Brownie was startled at her deep emotion. She had spoken lightly, and with no thought that she was probing an old wound.

She sprang up quickly, and seeing the fair old face above her almost convulsed with agony, she twined her arms about her neck, saying remorsefully:

"Auntie, dear, forgive me! Have I touched some hidden spring of sorrow? I would not have wounded you so for the world."

"Dear child, would you like to read a sad page in an old woman's history?"

"No, dear auntie, do not talk of anything that gives you pain. Forgive me for speaking in a way that should recall anything to distress you," said the young girl sadly.

"You did not think to pain me, and I am glad now that the conversation has taken this turn, for I would like you to know something of what my past has been."

"Let us wait until some other time—you are tired and ought to rest now," pleaded Brownie, recoiling from a revelation which she believed would be painful.

"No, Brownie, something prompts me to tell you now, and I will obey the call. The book of my life is almost written, love, and it will do no harm to review it once more before it is closed forever. I have borne my sorrow alone for [illegible] five years, and it seems as if it would do me good to breathe it to someone who would give me sympathy and remember it tenderly when I am gone."

Brownie's little hand fluttered down upon Mehetabel's lips, and the tears sprang to her eyes.

"Let us not talk about it, auntie; I don't like you to speak about going away from me. I should be desolate without you, if I had ever so much money," and the bright face wore a look of pain.

Miss Douglas drew the shining head down to her, and kissed the sweet lips.

"Well, well, so be it, though it must be sooner or later; but we will talk no more of it now. You are very precious to me, darling, and your love has been the only brightness of my life for the past eighteen years," she said softly. "Now lock the door," she added, after a moment's pause, "that we may be uninterrupted; then draw a chair beside me, and I'll tell you how I came to be an old maid. It may be a lesson that will do you good."

Brownie glided softly to the door and turned the key. Then she drew a low rocker and seated herself beside Miss Douglas, while a feeling of solemnity took possession of her, as she realized that a hidden page of life was about to be turned back for her to read.

CHAPTER III.

THE AUNT'S STORY.

"You know who the Douglases are?" began Miss Mehetabel, bracing herself up, with a little of pride.

"Oh, yes; you have always given me to understand that they belonged to a very honorable race."

"An honorable race, indeed! Why, child, we are the descendants of a queen—a Scottish queen! Lady Margaret Douglas was the daughter of Queen Margaret Tudor, and back to her we can trace our ancestry. Never forget it, child, never forget that you are descended in a direct line from the royalty of Scotland."

Brownie did not reply to her last remark, for it was a hobby with her proud kinswoman, and once thoroughly started on the subject, she knew the family tree would have to be brought out, and the wearisome task of tracing the Douglas race for three long centuries would have to be rehearsed. So she wisely held her peace.

"Yes, the descendants of a queen!" she repeated; "and many of our ancestors intermarried with the English nobility, so that today, Brownie Douglas, there runs no better blood in any veins than in yours and mine.

"Before I left the old country, dear, I mingled with the proudest circles of the land. I was presented at Court, and during a brilliant London season I was introduced to the young Lord Dunforth, son of the fifth Lord of Firth.

"His name was Royal—they called him Roy—and he was rightly named, for he was fit to be a king!"

"From the first hour of our meeting we loved each other, and we were betrothed, by the consent and approval of both his friends and my own, after an acquaintance of six months. Our marriage was to be delayed for a year, until he should complete his course at Oxford, when he would come in possession of a fine estate in Essex. We exchanged letters frequently, and the [illegible] he penned were like a feast to my soul. I love them now, every one, and they are all that have left of the love, the glorious love, which once fondly hoped would brighten my life to the end. In the same circle in which we moved there was a very handsome girl, by the name of Lady Helen Capel. She belonged to a very wealthy and honorable family, and it was said that betwixt Lord Dunforth was introduced to me he used to pay some attention to her. From the very first of my acquaintance with him she evinced an intense dislike toward me.

"Report said that she wanted to win him for herself, and I believe in my heart that was true, she was so haughty and disagreeable whenever we met.

"Lord Dunforth finished his course at Oxford with great honor to himself, and preparations were begun for our marriage, which was appointed to take place just before the Christmas holidays.

"One evening we attended a ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Ruxley.

"On entering the ballroom I had given my card to Roy to fill out such sets as he wished for himself, and then as others were introduced to me they put their names in the blanks that were left.

"Soon after, Charles Capel came up with a handsome but rather rakish-looking gentleman, whom he introduced as the Count de Lussac. Roy had left me for a few minutes to speak to someone he knew, or what followed never would have happened.

"The stranger immediately requested the pleasure of dancing with me, and I innocently consented, never for a moment dreaming that any one would be present in Lady Ruxley's parlors with whom it would not be proper for me to dance.

"I gave him my card and he put his name down against a waltz, while a peculiar smile curled his lips.

"Not many minutes after Helen Capel sauntered toward me and sat down by my side.

F one-half the Sisters are as busy making Christmas gifts as the other half has been in writing how to make them, then there is a chance that we'll get ourselves and our Corner disliked by the menfolks who may have to wait for their meals or go th holes in their stockings, while the wives re busy making all sorts of lovely things for ristmas. EAR MOTHER WILKINSON AND ALL:

I think she is a "mother" to us all. This is my first ter to COMFORT and as the door was open I walked I have taken COMFORT for a long time and wouldn't without it. If I want to know anything I go to MFORT and I nearly always find it.

Sisters, let us see how many Sisters' Circle Pins will taken by Christmas time. We all want one, don't ? Let's get busy. They would make a nice Christs gift to some COMFORT sister less fortunate than rselves.

I will describe myself and go, to make room for some- e else. I am five feet, four inches tall, have light own hair, gray-blue eyes and was thrty-two years old e 25th of last June. Am married to one of the best anks there is, I think. We have three girls. I am closing a picture of the youngest one, Effie Evalyn, hich I would like to see in COMFORT. I am also send- g for a pin.

For a long time I've wanted to say something the sisters about the Sisters' Circle Pin but dn't know how to express it. I had already ld them there was nothing compulsory about it d that they were just as much sisters without e pin as with it, but I hoped they would want e. It cost quite a lot to have the pins made and they were made only because I insisted at enough would be sold to make it worthwhile d I've been rather disappointed. I don't like have people say, "I told you so," so I am looking forward to the sale of hundreds and hundreds pins.—Ed.

EAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE COMFORT Sisters' Pin, given as a prize for the best recipe, has been sent, with Christmas greetings, to Naomi Fletcher of Roanoke, Ill. By "best," as has been explained before, is meant the recipe that an inexperienced cook can successfully follow, the recipe that has the exact quantities given and the plainest instructions for making. There was one recipe this month, a fruit cake, that had every appearance of being a prize winner, so neatly written that it wasn't necessary to copy, exact proportions given and, apparently, minute instructions for combining the different ingredients, but—"add the grape juice," and not a word had been said about grape juice. The most experienced cook could not tell whether a teaspoonful or a pint was meant. Of course the recipe could have been tried out and experimented upon and the exact quantity determined, but I feel that if a writer is willing and kind enough to send in a recipe for the benefit of others, she is willing and kind enough to be accurate, once the need for it is explained. Who wins next month?—Ed.

CHICKEN SOUP.—Roast a large chicken; clear all the meat from the bones, chop and pound it thoroughly with a quarter of a pound of boiled rice. Put the bones (broken) and the skin into two quarts of cold water. Let it simmer for some time, when it will make a weak broth. Strain it and add it to the chicken and rice. Now press this all through a sieve and put it away until dinner time. Take off the grease on top; heat it without boiling, and, just before sending to table, mix into it a gill of boiling cream. Season carefully with pepper and salt.

RAISIN PUFFS.—Beat one-half cup of sugar and one teaspoon of butter to a cream. Beat in one egg, one-half cup of milk, one cup of chopped raisins and spice to taste. Boil until thick and use it for filling for turnovers.—MARY HARROD NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

CHICKEN PIE.—Two chickens boiled tender in just enough water to cover them; when done line a deep dish with rich pastry then lay the chickens in, alternating the white and dark meat. When full, slice three hard-boiled eggs and lay over the top, and quite a quantity of butter cut fine, then turn over all the juice of the chickens and some rich stock thickened, and flavor to suit the taste. Cover with rich pastry and bake two hours.

CHRISTMAS BREAKFAST ROLLS.—In a deep mixing bowl put three tablespoons of butter, two tablespoons of sugar, one level teaspoon of salt, and pour over it two cups of scalding milk. When lukewarm add one compressed yeast-cake first thoroughly mixed with a little lukewarm water. Stir in bread flour until very stiff, then turn out on floured board and knead until it will neither stick to hands nor board. Cover and set in a fairly warm place to rise. In the morning cut down, and if time, let rise again. Roll about half an inch thick, cut with biscuit cutter, brush over with melted butter, crease each through the center with a knife and fold over. Rise till nearly as large again and bake in a hot oven until brown. Remove from tin, break open and spread each with a little melted butter and fill with a slice of cranberry jelly and a piece of hot crisp bacon.—MRS. A. M. G., Augusta, Maine.

Begin at one end and roll it up neatly, tying to keep it in shape. Cover the top of the roll with shreds of pork, put in a pan with a little water, and bake till tender, basting frequently. Thicken the gravy with a little browned flour and pour over meat before serving.

WALLED OYSTERS.—Line a pudding pan with mashed potatoes and glaze it with well-beaten egg. Set in the oven until thoroughly heated and of a delicate brown. While this is in the oven put on your saucepan, into which put the liquor from a quart of oysters; let it boil, add the liquor and season, letting all boil together for four minutes; remove the oysters and put in the liquor a teaspoon of cream, a tablespoon of butter, and enough flour to thicken. Boil until thick, then put the oysters and prepared liquor in the potato paste and serve at once.

In a separate dish beat three eggs, add to the eggs three tablespoons of corn-starch and a quart of good rich milk and a piece of butter size of walnut. When hard ball stage is reached (when it forms a hard ball when dropped into cold water), add soda and remove from fire. Have corn freshly popped and in a large pan and pour the hot syrup over it. Wet the hands and press into balls of uniform size. —MRS. L. E. STADLER, Reidsville, R. R. 1, N. C.

CHRISTMAS PUDDING.—Twelve eggs well beaten, two and one-half coffee cups brown sugar, one coffee cup melted butter, one tablespoon of cloves, mace and cinnamon each, eight crackers pounded and soaked in one pint of cold milk, one teaspoon salt, two quarts of milk warmed, one coffee cup of citron, two and one-half coffee cups stoned raisins. Flour to make thick batter. Bake in layers and put whipped cream or boiled icing between each layer and on top. This is also good with dried apples or raisins. Does not seem dry, like lots of dried fruit cakes. —MRS. E. H. W., Creswell, Ore.

HOWARD, BOX 42, N. Y.

DEAR FRIENDS:

Mrs. Wilkinson asked for Christmas suggestions. I hope my letter will help someone. Don't you think there were a lot of good suggestions in "The Hope Chest Girl" in September COMFORT?

A novel way to give fruit would be to make a crepe paper bell, large enough to cover whatever fruit you give; grapes work in nicely. Leave a hole in top of bell to put the stem through and tie a ribbon bow on it. The fruit shows below as a clapper. If you think you can give a chicken or canned fruit or something along that line, cut top off pumpkin, scrape out the seeds and place your gift inside, replace top and wrap up and you will have a Christmas gift that is a little different.

I think that Christmas is getting to be more of an exchange of gifts than it should be. One dear lady I know went among a crowd of children in front of a large store and listened to them tell what they would like. She used her pencil and pad and got the names of the children she could buy for and on Christmas Eve she delivered the gifts at their homes and asked the mothers to hang up the children's stockings and put her gifts in them. It doesn't take as much to make people happy as we think. A few cents spent in the right way and a cheery smile will work wonders.

MRS. CLAUDE HUGHES.

HERMANVILLE, R. R. 1, BOX 27, MISS.

DEAR SISTERS AND MRS. WILKINSON:

I have taken COMFORT many years and read the Sisters' Corner with much interest. I think the Sisters' Circle Pin a fine thing and especially for this reason, each sister should always wear her pin when traveling or visiting so that we can recognize each other just as our husbands recognize a fellow lodge member by a pin.

I am very fond of reading and playing with the children. I have two boys of my own, four and two years old. We live on a farm and have lots of fun going in swimming.

I would appreciate it if the sisters would send me a small scrap of silk, enough to make a two-inch square, as I want a COMFORT silk bed cover. Letters with scraps will be doubly appreciated and I'd like to answer all but feel that I won't be able to do so and will not say now that I will. It's better to do that now than write to Mrs. Wilkinson later that I can't.

I live four miles from town, in the woods, and have to walk half a mile to my mail box and most of the time I don't get any mail. I will wait patiently and see if the Fates will be kind to this farmer's wife, but I assure you if a more worthy letter takes the place of this I shall not mind very much, though, of course, we all cherish a wee small hope that ours will be printed.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton, born rich, dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Upon her death there is left forty pounds a year. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; she has no faith in him, and finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis'. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman. He does not explain but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. She remodels a velvet dress sewn with amethysts for Mrs. Gibbs, who tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, hearing footsteps, and a whistle which reminds her of Lesard, listens, and with shoes in hand steals down the stair-case and spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." With his words, "Promise to trust me whatever happens," ringing in her ears, she gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The masked ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PEARL COLLAR.

SOMEHOW Gillian got through that awful night; just how, she never knew.

Yet it had been strangely easy to keep Jacky quiet. After hearing that wild avowal she had scarcely spoken; had never rebelled as Gillian made her get into bed. Only one thing she said clasping Gillian to a silent, faithful heart:

"Gill, do you care? Do you love him?" She had whispered.

"Better than heaven—worse than hell," said Gillian, dry-lipped. "But it's not that so much as—oh, Jacky, the shame! I could not bear the shame!"

"You sha'n't—through me," her voice was quiet enough, but she bit into her arms as she buried her face in them. Not for a hundred thousand jewels should Gillian's story and her own come out, and yet if it had not been for Gillian she could have laughed to see Lesard hunted down.

"Lesard Gillian's husband! Lesard!" She writhed in her bed. It could not be true; there must be something wrong somewhere. And yet she knew it was true as that she, who hated a thief, had stood quietly by and seen the house robbed of some of the finest jewels in England.

"Why didn't I scream? Be killed, anything? rather than let him go?" She was sick with humiliation. "Now I can't do anything. If I speak it will only drag her out before the world as a burglar's wife. It wouldn't even mean catching him. And I can't! I can't! I won't have Gill in any court nor in all the papers, nor have her know that it is I—I who stand in her shoes, and I called her a coward." Her tearless sobs racked her. "A coward! and she is downstairs now, facing them all, dancing, when she has found out—this!"

Gill sat at supper downstairs—for she dared not stay away—her mask off, her face white as ashes, waiting in deadly terror lest any minute some woman's maid might fly in and say her jewel-box was gone.

Sir Charles Vivian opposite her looked with wonder at her dry lips, her shaking hands, as she tried to eat. He had once seen a woman look like that—only once; but she knew that her husband had to fly for his life for murder; and she was a woman, not a girl. He got up and filled Gillian's glass with champagne.

"Drink this, get it down," he ordered, standing behind her, and without answering she obeyed him. The wine seemed to run like fire to her finger-ends, to her knees.

"You're very kind to me," she said, as the other people left the table and he sat down by her, but there was no light of gratitude in her vacant eyes.

"You're ill. You ought to be in bed. Won't you go?" he asked, not daring to look at her strained face.

"I can't; it would make a fuss. Mr. Marchmont hates fuss," she whispered.

"Let him," said Vivian shortly. "Hello! What's the row over there? Why, little Mrs. Fareham's fainting."

Gillian followed his eyes. The room was filled with small tables that held four people only, and at the second one from them, among the flowers and champagne bottles, something was happening—something she had expected, and it was only the champagne that Vivian had made her swallow that kept her from screaming.

A frantic maid, regardless of appearances, stood wild-eyed over her mistress, who was standing, swaying, as if she would fall.

"They're gone, madam, gone! And her grace's, too!"

Mrs. Fareham's shriek rang in Gillian's ears.

"The diamonds! They weren't mine, they were borrowed! Borrowed!" her voice was piercing, hysterical; everyone in the room turned.

There was a hubbub of questions and answers, a flight of every woman in the house-party from the room to see if the news were true, and if her jewels were gone like Mrs. Fareham's. Only Gillian never stirred; she sat motionless, wide-eyed, as if she were stunned. Sir Charles, coming back to her side, gazed at her where she sat like a woman in a nightmare.

"It's nothing, I hope—I'm nearly certain!" he said gravely. "Look out! You've cut your hand!"

For the tumbler that held the champagne had broken into pieces as she gripped it.

And now she could not speak! She sat, in frozen misery, never even seeing that Vivian had gently taken the broken tumbler from her fingers, stripped off her cut glove, and was wiping the blood from her hand with his handkerchief.

"Don't look so frightened," he said very softly, his honest eyes full of tenderness; "there's no danger. It's all over, and they're sure to catch the thieves."

"Catch them! Oh, my God!" said Gillian's mind, but her stiff lips never moved. Her heart, her honor were out there fleeing through the night. Only her body was in the lighted supper-room, hearing for consolation her worst dread put into words.

"Are you afraid your jewels will be gone, and that Marchmont will be angry with you? Is that it?" asked Vivian, wonderingly, and then he stared in amazement.

"My jewels!" she stood up, a strange passion in her face. "I hate them. I wish they were all gone—all!"

A hand, very white and soft, was laid on her shoulder. Mr. Marchmont, not as calm as usual, was by her side.

"My dear child, I hope you are not frightened!" he said smoothly. "And I hope you haven't lost anything. Have you looked?"

Had he heard? Gillian was past caring.

"Lost anything—I? I don't know," she said slowly, and Vivian saw her shoulder slip from under Marchmont's hand.

"Your pearls! Aren't you wearing them?" with a curious sound in his voice the girl noted, not Vivian.

She put her slim hand to her throat vaguely; the pearls were not there.

"I meant to put them on; I must have forgotten," she muttered. "I think I left them on my dressing-table."

"Then your maid probably put them away!" with apparent relief. "Shall I go and ask her?"

"She's ill; she's in bed!" it was almost a cry. "I'll go and see."

She broke away from her guardian as she spoke, and fairly ran from the room.

"She's frightened—unstrung!" observed that gentleman to Sir Charles. "She has had a horror of burglars ever since the Hollis' were robbed."

"She seems unstrung!" returned Sir Charles dryly. He was beginning to have no opinion whatever of Mr. Marchmont. No girl who is young and beautiful should hate jewels, and this one seemed also to hate and fear the man who had given them to her. Sir Charles hung about to see what would happen if the jewels had been stolen.

He had not to wait long. Gillian was back almost immediately, absolute amazement written on her face.

"They're gone," she gasped, "but my jewel-case is there."

If Vivian had expected her guardian to fall on his ward and berate her, he was disappointed.

"My poor Gillian;" said Marchmont, his courteous voice very kind and smooth. "Don't look so frightened, it was not your fault. If we do not catch the thieves, you shall have new pearls."

But Gillian Hamilton never answered him. She stood with that curious surprise frozen on her face.

Had she wronged Marchmont—or was he only the most consummate actor the world ever saw?

If he were the last, she—his tool—was playing into his hands, and she loathed herself, yet saw no other way.

"The shame of it!" she thought passionately, and then a sudden recollection made her cry out: "Oh, that poor little woman! Her diamonds were borrowed. She will be ruined if she has to pay for them!"

"My ward has a very tender heart," said Mr. Marchmont to Sir Charles with precisely the right inflection.

"She ought to go to bed; she's done up," Sir Charles returned bluntly. With or without reason, he longed to kick Mr. Marchmont.

CHAPTER IX.

THE TORTURE OF JACKY.

Before nine next morning all Wellford House was up in arms. The local police had arrived and detectives from London; each and every person in the house had been put through an examination as to their whereabouts at the time of the robbery, and no one had either evidence or suspicion to offer.

Gillian had gone into the room where the head of the local police was seeing each person one by one. She looked pale and frightened, and very young. Not even the London detective dreamed for one moment that this pretty, gray-eyed girl, who had lost her pearl necklace, knew more about the robbery than any one but the man who had planned it.

She stood by the door, her hand on a chair, for her knees were shaking.

What should she do if they asked her a question she could not evade? The beating of her heart shook her, but her lips faltered as she answered the very cursory questions asked her.

She little knew that it was to Sir Charles Vivian she owed the fact that they were so few. His statement not five minutes since to the local man, who was a tenant of his, had taken all responsibility off Gillian's shoulders.

"What was I doing, Evans?" he had said. "Let me see! The dance before supper I had with Miss Hamilton," musingly. "I was called away to speak to Lady Wellford; I came back later on, met Miss Hamilton at the drawing-room door, and we went in to supper. We were still there when the news came out. I'm afraid I'm not a very useful witness, Evans, or Miss Hamilton, either."

"No, sir, no! It's just a matter of form," apologetically. "You didn't see any one suspicious in the ballroom or anywhere?"

"I saw a lot of idiots in fancy dress, but I saw them all at supper afterward and they seemed pretty respectable," absently. He had forgotten all about the monk, whom he certainly had not seen at supper.

"I'll send Miss Hamilton now, Evans," and he had departed, quite unconscious that to save Gillian discomfort he had utterly disposed of all hopes of catching the thieves; and with no idea that it was certainly not Gillian Hamilton who had been with him during that dance before supper.

"I suppose we can see your maid!" Mr. Evans said, as Gillian was turning away, having been asked nothing as to her movements, but how she came to forget her pearl necklace.

"Yes, of course. But she was ill; I sent her to bed," truth that was not truth making her feel sick with shame. She knew nothing about my not wearing my pearls."

"Ill in bed? Oh, well; we need not see her." Mr. Evans had no idea of making himself disliked by the future Lady Vivian, as he considered Gillian from Sir Charles' manner of speaking of her.

The London detective, yawning in the background, agreed with him. This amateur nonsense about the people in the house was childish; he was quite certain he could put his fingers on the thieves. Wellford House was not the first burglary he had been engaged in discovering, but it was the one he was determined to unravel; for the value of the stolen jewels was enormous; not a woman of the house-party had saved anything but the jewels she was wearing, and the aggregate reward offered by the bereft ones would amount to a decent competency for life.

Gillian, thankful to escape, flew up-stairs to her room.

"Jacky," she but the door and spoke in a needless whisper "you needn't go down. The man says he doesn't ant you."

Jacky was pa ing furiously, for the robbery had broken up the party. The duchess had already set the example by leaving for London, and Mr. Marchmont was only too anxious to follow her august lead.

She looked up from where she knelt in her smart black satin that showed off her round, young figure so daintily.

Her eyes were swollen and heavy; there were lines round her mouth that had never been there and they showed through all her face bleach.

"How did you do it?" she asked slowly.

"I didn't do it. The man said it of his own accord." Jacky laid in the last gown without a word, and locked and strapped the boxes. Then she got up as if her knees were stiff and old.

"Gill," she said, "have you thought at all of what we're going to do?"

"Do? We can't do anything. It's done." Her voice was full of a resigned despair that made her sister furiously angry. "What do you mean?"

"Just what I say. We thought of ourselves last night; I don't know whether we can go on doing it."

"We had nothing to do with the robbery," sharply.

"No. We could only have caught the thieves! Don't look so frightened, I haven't any intention of telling. It's only that I saw Mrs. Fareham's maid this morning, and she says her mistress is nearly crazy. Those diamonds of hers were borrowed from a cousin who is married to a Jew stockbroker; the man hates her; she will have to pay every penny they're worth if they're not recovered, and face a scandal besides, for he is quite capable of saying that she stole them. You see, there are other people to suffer besides you and me!"

Gillian put her hands to her head.

"Jacky, what can I do?" she cried passionately. "Put yourself in my place. Think, think, what you would feel like if you were me! How do I know that if I told all I knew and said I was his wife, that I might not find out he had been married before! And what would I be then?" her miserable face crimson. "You can think of Mrs. Fareham. Can't you think first of me?"

Think of her! Not till daylight was gray in the east had Jacky Hamilton thought of any one but Gillian. Then, as if a knife had been plunged deep in her breast and some one had suddenly turned it, her own agony came to her. It was Lesard who had done this thing! Lesard, the heart of her heart, who was a liar and a thief, the right hand in iniquity of the man he had despised and condemned.

His stern, lean face, his hawk's eyes, his mouth that was so sweet and strong, had risen up before her in the dawning, clear as if she saw them in very deed. She buried her head in her hands. An insult, a deadly treachery. And if Lesard were such as this, could there be any truth anywhere in earth or heaven?

Small wonder her face was haggard when she rose and painted it to face the world. Gillian could talk; only she must be silent while black crime went by, for Gillian's sake, not Lesard's.

There was nothing but fierce loathing in her for the man who had wronged them both. She could have kissed Lesard on his lips for the beauty that she loved, and driven a knife into his heart in the same breath for the very hatred of him.

And now Gillian cried out to her to think of her!

Jacky caught her breath.

"I do think of you. I'd kill myself, soul and body, for you!" she muttered. "Don't speak to me like that!"

"I know," Gillian was crying silently. "You don't want me to tell; say you don't!" she pleaded. "Listen, Jacky! Then you'll be couldn't tell, you'll understand. I met when I was with father; I think I love from the very first day. You've seen him you ever see any man like him? Who him, moved like him, had such ways?"

Jacky Hamilton dropped to her knees ox under the butcher's mallet, and laid on Gillian's knees to hide her painted face.

"No! Go on," she said, with a hard "Go on."

"Well, he loved me. The day he the room went round. I couldn't see, his voice as if he were miles away. I faced the judgment day when he kissed

O you ever think how unchangeable is the Christmas spirit, and how the customs of centuries ago remain as fresh and enjoyable as ever? There will be no difference in the flavor but the second jelly will not be transparent. Measure the juice and an equal measure of sugar. Bring the juice to a boil, cook five minutes and skim. When it begins to cook, gradually add one cup of hot milk while con- tinuously stirring. Cook ten min- utes, then stir in one cup of rich cheese cut into small pieces, and stir until the cheese dissolves. Add the macaroni, toss until hot and serve.

SAUSAGE TURNOVERS.—Cut one and a half pound of fresh lean pork and one-half pound of fresh fat pork into inch pieces. Beat until smooth. Bake in loaf bread tins in a slow oven one hour and twenty minutes.

CEREAL MERINGUES.—Beat two fresh egg whites until stiff and dry, gradually beat in one-half cup of powdered sugar, one and a half cup of corn flakes and a small pinch of salt. Drop by tea- spoonfuls on a slightly greased tin a little way apart and bake in a very moderate oven until a delicate brown.

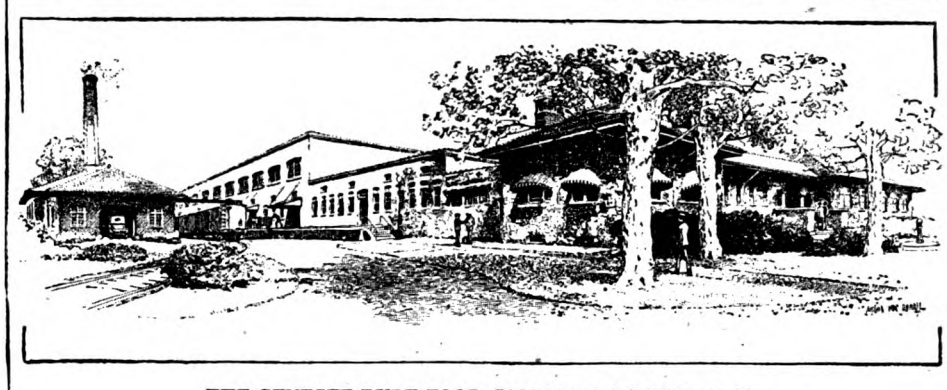
PASTRY.—If all the in- gredients are measured with accuracy a light, tender pastry is assured. Use a measuring cup, and measure flour after it is sifted, filling the cup with a spoon. Into the mixing bowl put three-fourths cup of cold lard, cream with a spoon and gradually add one-half cup of ice- water. Have ready three cups of flour sifted with half a teaspoon of salt and one-fourth teaspoon of baking powder. Add flour to lard mixture, using two knives to work it in. Handle the dough as little as possible, shaping with the fingers instead of kneading. Roll quite thin.

BANANA AND PRESERVED DAMSON PIE.—Line a deep plate with pastry. Put in a layer of sliced banana and sprinkle with three tablespoons of sugar and a few gratings of lemon peel. Cover with a layer of damson preserve, then another of banana and top with damson. If the filling ap- pears too juicy mix a level tablespoon each of flour and sugar and sprinkle it over the top. Dot with a little butter and cover with a top crust. Bake three-quarters of an hour. This is an English pie and is sometimes served with a sauce made as follows: Beat one egg very light and gradual- ly beat in one cup of cream and a third of a cup of damson juice. Set in a dish of hot water or use double boiler, and stir until the sauce thick- ens.



MOCK CHERRY PIE.—Two cups of ripe cranber- ries cut in half, one cup of rai- sins seeded and cut in pieces, one and one- half cup of sug- ar mixed with two tablespoons of flour. Line deep plate with pastry, fill with the cranberries and raisins and pour the sugar mixture over the top. Cross strips of pastry over the pie and bake one hour in a moderate oven.

THE GENESEE PURE FOOD COMPANY, LE ROY, N. Y.

INTO the Jell-O factory you see pictured above come materials from five continents and from the islands of five seas.

Jell-O comes from the four corners of the globe. Jell-O is an international!

Have you any idea of the size of the task involved in manufacturing America's Most Famous Dessert?

Scattered over almost the whole world are thousands and thousands of human beings who, without knowing it, are largely dependent for their livelihood on what happens in the little town of Le Roy, in the western part of the State of New York, U. S. A.

You good folk who have put your faith in Jell-O and have made it the indispensable food product it is, should by right know more about it.

Thousands of miles away from hundreds of thousands of Jell-O's friends, clear over in Sicily under the shadow of Mt. Etna, are the most beautiful groves imaginable! And from these groves in a slow, winding stream comes the fruit from which we make your citrus flavors. Funny little two-wheeled carts, gaudily painted and drawn by a horse or mule with harness richly decorated with silver and tassels, are loaded high. And on the top sits a little old man with a long tasseled hat. Jell-O is kissed by the sun of Sicily!

That you may have your orange and lemon colors, pure vegetable colors—we go into far off picturesque India, and there the brown man in turban and quiet dignity toils the long day through. The land of the Brahmans contributes its best to Jell-O.

Italy, France and England from their grape vineyards send us the finest tartaric acid to be obtained. It is not to be wondered at that Jell-O has the delicious tartness of fruit itself.

Far away tiny Java with its motley horde of Orientals, touches Jell-O by sending to us her finest sugar. But Java is but one source of sugar. Huge quantities come from South America and Cuba.

Bustling Brazil and its wealth of splendid vegetation provide its choicest chocolate.

And again to the far side of the world we go for cudbear, a vegetable product from which we make the various reds you like so well in Jell-O.

Of course, our own homeland contributes its share, for much of the gelatine in Jell-O is domestic, as is much of the fruit flavor.

True it is then, that we comb the world to give you the best in Jell-O.

True it is also that Jell-O is a national—international—food product of the purest, cleanest possible sort.

A FEW JELL-O RECIPES

SNOW PUDDING

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water. When cold and still liquid whip with an egg-beater to consistency of whipped cream. Let stand till firm and then pile it by spoonfuls into sherbet glasses and serve with an egg custard.

MAGIC ICE

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in a pint of boiling water. When it is cool, if you can get them, add green Malaga grapes, halved and seeded, and let harden. Remove by spoonfuls into sherbet glasses. The irregular mass looks like ice and is delicious.

PINEAPPLE BAVARIAN CREAM

Dissolve a package of Lemon Jell-O in half a pint of boiling water and add half a pint of juice from a can of pineapple. When cold and still liquid whip to consistency of whipped cream. Add a cup of the shredded pineapple. Pour into mould and set in a cold place to harden. Turn from mould and garnish with pineapple, cherries or grapes.

ALMOND CHERRY

Dissolve a package of Cherry Jell-O in a pint of boiling water. Pour half into a bowl or mould. Just as it begins to harden, drop in a row of blanched almonds or walnut meats. When hard pour in rest of Jell-O, add another row of almonds, and set away to harden.

NEAPOLITAN WHIP

Dissolve one package of Lemon Jell-O in one-half pint of boiling water, add one-half pint of juice from canned pineapple. When cold but still liquid set the dish in a pan of ice water or very cold water and whip with Dover eggbeater until consistency of whipped cream. Fold in two or three slices of canned pineapple, finely chopped. Turn into square mould, filling half full. Then dissolve a package of Raspberry Jell-O in half a pint of boiling water, add half a pint of juice of canned or fresh raspberries and proceed the same as with pineapple whip, folding in the berries which have been sweetened if tart. Fill the mould.

Cubby Bear Travels Swiftly

By Lena B. Ellingwo

"HERE are some yellow flowers I picked for you, Grandma Bear. And look at the pretty little ferns with them!" As he spoke, Cubby held out the little woodland bouquet with a loving smile.

Grandma Bear seized it eagerly.

"Oh, Cubby Bear! Where did you find the maiden-hair fern?" she asked. "I had some like it close beside the doorstep where I lived, on the mountain-side, so long. I wish, oh, how I wish, I might go there and see the place once more!"

"It is a hard climb," said Mamma Bruin. "You would be tired out long before you got there."

Grandma Bear said nothing in reply, but one morning soon after, she came out of her little room wearing her best bonnet and black silk mitts.

"Why, Grandma," asked Cubby, eying her wonderingly, "you are not going away, are you?"

"I am going to see my old home," answered Grandma Bear firmly, "and I may be gone a number of days. "Will you go with me, Cubby Bear?"

"Oh, gladly!" cried Cubby.

A worried pucker came between Mamma Bruin's eyes.

"I am afraid you could never stand it to go there and back," she said.

"My heart is set on going, so do not try to stop me," replied Grandma Bear.

After breakfast Mamma Bruin said, "If you go, of course I shall go with you, and I shall get Dr. Squilly Porcupine to go, too."

"'The more, the merrier'," agreed Grandma Bear. "Ask others, too, and we will have a fine camping party."

"Shinyblack Crow could fly ahead, and show us the easiest way to go," said Mamma Bruin. "I will see the others today, and we can start tomorrow morning, bright and early."

That afternoon Cubby heard a quick tapping at the door, but before he could reach the door, it was opened suddenly from outside, and Bonniebelle Bear, all smiles and happiness, came running in—Bonniebelle Bear, Cubby's little cousin, whom he had not seen for a long time.

He greeted her with delight, then hurried around to find Mamma Bruin and tell her the glad news.

"Shall we put off Grandma Bear's old home journey until after Bonniebelle's visit is over?" Cubby whispered the question.

"No, indeed," answered Mamma Bruin, "she will like to go with us, I am sure."

Shinyblack Crow and Dr. Squilly Porcupine came before sunrise next morning, and the camping party had an early start.

Grandma Bear's faded eyes were bright with joy, and she hurried on her way blithely.

"I find it is harder for me to climb than when I was younger," she sighed when, at the close of the second day, the mountain-top still lay before them. But in time they reached the top, and began the descent of the further side.

They were making their way through a thicket of close-growing bushes, when Bonniebelle cried:

"Oh, I have broken the ribbon that held my gold locket! See? I caught it on the bushes." And she held up the blue ribbon she always wore around her neck. "Have you a good, safe pocket, Cousin Cubby?"

"Yes," answered Cubby, "right here in my coat."

"Then, if you please, will you keep my locket for me?"

So Cubby took the locket, and felt very proud to be trusted to carry such a precious thing.

Shinyblack Crow, who had flown ahead of the others, came back to meet them, and with him was Drummer Partridge, who had been one of Grandma Bear's old neighbors.

"You will find things sadly changed," said Drummer Partridge. "Our old neighborhood is not at all as it used to be. Woodsmen have been logging on the mountain-side. But come, you shall see for yourself."

Changed, indeed, it was. Most of the forest growth had been cut down, and where great trees used to stand were now unsightly stumps. After some trouble, they found the place where Grandma Bear's house had been, but no house was there, and the maiden-hair fern which she had cherished was gone.

"What is that thing, down there?" asked Cubby Bear, pointing, "with the big log out over it?"

"Oh, that," answered Drummer Partridge, "is a log-chute, which the woodsmen made to slide the logs down over the mountain to the river below. And that log was left there at the top when they finished work last spring. Next winter they will send it sliding down, I suppose. It is a great sight, but rather a scary one, to see the great logs go racing down the chute, one after another! Come nearer to it. There, now you can see."

"Look far away down there at the bottom," said Dr. Squilly Porcupine, pointing to where, nearly half a mile away, the chute ended, near the river bank. "Why is it made to turn up like that at the lower end?"

"Why, when the logs reach that place," explained Drummer, "they are going so fast, they fly up into the air and then go splashing over beyond, into the river."

Squilly Porcupine mounted the log whose end stood out over the steep chute, and Bonniebelle sprang up beside him.

"Run out to the other end, Cubby Bear," Squilly said, "and we will have a 'teeter'." And Squilly laughed at what he meant for a little joke.

But Cubby ran out on the log gaily, never thinking of danger.

"Who dares to come with me?" he called.

Even then he might have been safe, if Squilly and Bonniebelle had stayed where they were, to balance him.

But Squilly was frightened, and sprang off the log hurriedly, pulling Bonniebelle by the paw.

"Come back, Cubby Bear! Jump for your life!" he shrieked.

Poor Cubby, frightened and wild-eyed, had no time to think what to do.

THERE CAME A TREMENDOUS SPLASH.

The log, with the weight of Bonniebelle and Squilly gone, tipped quickly, and went flying down over the slippery, smooth-worn chute at almost lightning speed.

Cubby's claws dug into the bark, as he clung to the log with all his might. He felt confused and dizzy. He could not breathe, though the air whistled sharply in his ears as he whizzed along.

Surely a little bear never traveled so swiftly! In almost no time at all, he had reached the lower end of the chute, where it curved. The log shot up over the curve, and went flying through space, Cubby still clinging to it with his might. Then came a tremendous splash. It seemed to Cubby that the end of all things had come.

He had been thrown from the log, and with nothing to cling to, sank down, down, down to the bottom of the deep, cold river.

"I shall never see Mamma Bruin again," he thought. "Oh, I wish I had been a better little bear!"

Then he was amazed to feel the good, cool water blowing in his face.

He opened his eyes and gasped for breath. He had risen to the river's surface.

"How did I get here?" he wondered. "I thought I was drowned!"

But he began to sink again, and closed his eyes helplessly.

"Swim, Cubby Bear! swim!" shouted a familiar voice, and the words were followed by excited "Caw, caws!"

Shinyblack Crow had flown after Cubby, and now hovered over the water, his great wings flapping.

At the sound of his friend's voice, Cubby Bear took courage, and struck out bravely for the shore. Soon he clambered up the river's bank, dripping and shivering.

"You are not hurt, are you?" asked Shinyblack.

"N—no——I don't think so," faltered Cubby, shaking the water from his face and ears.

He heard a mocking laugh near by.

"You don't think so!" jeered a young otter coming up to Cubby Bear. "You ought to think! My, but you were a sight, splashing into the river like that. I down stream a little way, but I saw it all. came here to see if you got out all right."

"Why," exclaimed Cubby Bear, "I do believe you are Sammie Otter, who was at Furry Creek coasting party last winter."

"Sammie is my name, and you are Cubby Bear who won the prize at that same coasting party."

"Oh, h, oh!" cried Cubby Bear suddenly. He had put his paw into his pocket, and made a terrible discovery.

"What is it?" asked Shinyblack and Sammie.

"Bonniebelle's gold locket, which she had me take for safe keeping," answered Cubby woefully. "I have lost it. It must have slipped out of my pocket when I went head first into the river."

"Dear, dear!" mourned Shinyblack. "We can never find it, never."

"What shall I do?" wailed Cubby. "I cannot go back to Bonniebelle without her locket!"

"Take hope!" It was Sammie Otter who spoke. "You beat me at the coasting party, but I will show you that I bear no grudge, by helping you now. There's nobody hereabouts who can beat me at diving. Your cousin's locket is as good as found."

Into the river plunged Sammie, but he soon came up, empty-pawed.

"I'll try it again," he said, and went down once more.

"Look," said Shinyblack Crow. "See who is coming."

Cubby looked where Shinyblack pointed.

"Why, they're all coming!" he exclaimed.

Sure enough, Squilly Porcupine was waddling along only a little way off, puffing as though he had hurried very fast indeed. Bonniebelle was not far behind him, and in the distance could be seen Mamma Bruin helping Grandma Bear over some rough stones.

Sammie Otter popped his head out of the water and winked his little eye.

"I'll find it yet!" he promised, and disappeared again.

Squilly sat down on a rock, and wiped his face. Then he opened his medicine-case, and solemnly passed Cubby Bear a large, white pill.

"To keep you from taking cold," he said. "I can tell you, you gave us a terrible fright, Cubby Bear. We all started after you at once. The others are coming, and Bonniebelle is near here."

"I cannot meet her!" groaned Cubby.

Then Bonniebelle herself came running up to them.

"I am so glad you are safe, Cousin Cubby," she said.

"But your locket——" began Cubby sorrowfully.

Just here Sammie Otter sprang up out of the water.

"Your locket is safe, too, and has had a fine washing, Miss Bonniebelle!" So said Sammie, as he made a long bow and held out the lost locket, all bright and shining.

So the adventure ended happily. Sammie Otter was warmly thanked, and invited to go back to the Pleasant Forest with the others.

Shinyblack Crow showed them the way around the mountain, so they need not climb it again; and Grandma Bear, though her old home was destroyed, declared she had had a delightful vacation, and should go again next year.

Crumbs of Comfort

To love is to know.
Life is a tissue of habits.
Time is the supreme illusion.
Nature is the mother of marvels.
All men have need of compassion.
Discouragement is always unbelief.
We must accept ourselves as we are.
Faith is certitude without proving.
Joy makes all beauty more beautiful.
He who cannot pray is indeed solitary.
Love itself is a faith that needs no creed.
To repel one's cross is to make it heavier.
Every life has its possibility of greatness.
Humanity is tough and survives all catastrophes.
Much that is sowed in tears is reaped in triumph.
Life should be a constant giving birth to the soul.
Let us feel and live, and beware of too much analysis.
Every man is a priest and our conduct is unspoken sermons.
The world is a world of men and these men are our brothers.
We are always restless until we have given our heart away
Blessed be childhood which brings heaven to our rough earth.
Only evil grows of itself; goodness needs effort and courage.
A serene tenderness of heart is the truest happiness and wisdom.
Great men are the true men, the men in whom Nature has succeeded.

HERE'S the last month of the year, the midnight-striking twelfth month of 1922, soon to be laid upon Time's dusty shelf—that place of storage filled with old years and crumbling centuries. To a Family as vast as irs, the passage of a year makes many changes, ith much to remember and much to look forard to. I know we have grown in size, for I ave seen the big circle stretching wider and ider as the months have passed—and spreading ripple of smiles and cousinships around the orld. And I'm sure we have grown happier, for e linking of friendship is certain to bring new atisfactions and joys. I am a greater and happier Uncle than ever before and with a greater nd happier Family to group around me this holiay season. So the Christmas wishes I send broadast to you can be big and merry—and the echo your answering greetings will make joyful ckles in my ears and broaden my Christmas nile several inches. For it is the glad season —and we are a Glad Bunch!

This is our festival. Let us make the most of We are glad at Christmas because each of us ecomes then an emissary of joy, a collector of neer, a bringer of gifts—a reflecting point of hat spirit which made the angels sing when a hild was born unto us, a Leader of Love, a rince of Peace. It is the world's Great Holiday. The happy, jostling crowds that fill the streets f my city, jamming the big stores and cramming he trolleys and subways, are all abroad with earts of good will and ready smiles which aborb all bumps, shoves and inconveniences of getting about in the holiday rush. It would seem as Christmas was something that must be bought —and that there was not enough to go 'round. have been out in the crush several times and ave brought home armfuls of big and little packages, gathered among shining eyes and smiling aces. To go through the various "toy lands" and toy towns" established by the large department tores is great fun for me and something. I look orward to each December. This celebration of the irth of a Child is one of the dearest parts of hildhood, and fun runs high among red-cheeked evelers.

Although one may justly criticize and say that oo much of a true rejoicing at the birth of Christ s buried under a riot of gift-giving and noisy erriment, standing far apart from the coming nto the world of the Manger Baby, yet this medey of varied joy and present-making has its beter side, its humanity which gives it worth, perhaps, in the eyes of Him who loved to call Himself the Son of Man. Hearts are opened and become happy and freely-giving for the holiday season, at least, because they have been swept for a time into the spirit of Christ whose heart was open to all, whose giving was His life, whose happiness was to spend Himself for the saving of a world.

Our task is not to lessen this working of the Christmas spirit in our modern life, but to see that it becomes more than a holiday—or holy day—expression of living and doing. He who was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the King was born for all time. Not for a day or for a week was given the message of peace and good will on earth, but for all the coming centuries down which that earth must roll. When we give, and are given unto; when we seek not our own, but another's good; when we love, even as we are loved—then we are truly keeping the Christmas spirit, we are living the teachings of the Christ we celebrate. It is not a foolish dream to think that this spirit can be held by us for more than a holiday season. It is one of our heart's highest hopes to feel that as we make this spirit a steady part of our daily life we have saved our own happiness and that of the world for all time. We have made cheer constant. We have written Merry Christmas on our hearts to keep the message there forever.

We have Christmas Clubs that are formed, as many of you know, to save throughout the year the pennies, nickels and dimes which can be expended at Christmas time. I want to see a Christmas Club that would expend itself during the whole year, that would always distribute just the same sort of gifts and happiness we now hold as ours for so brief a period. Too many that receive cake once a year, get bread throughout the other eleven months—and sometimes only stones. And we can maintain our Christmas giving during the year more easily than Christmas Club members might think. We need only to follow an old rule—one known to Christ and followed by him—that the truest gift is a part of ourselves. We can give ourselves again and again, and still have our Christmas Club capital intact; we can empty our hearts many times, and yet find them overflowing for the next thirsty ones; we can smile and leave a trail of cheer behind us—and yet find new laughter always ready for another day's shadow-chasing.

So do not let your Christmas preparations end with the passing of 1922. Hang on to your Merry Christmas smiles throughout the coming months of 1923 and keep your pockets and your hearts as open as they are through these busy happy weeks. A Christmas tree cannot last very long at most, but the spirit it stands for can be made as evergreen as the tree which is its symbol. Deck your lives with small and great gifts, with little kindnesses and daily sparkling thoughts of cheer and happiness-giving. Why, if every member of our Big Bunch became a twelve-month Santa Claus of Joy, I'm sure 1923 would go down on record as the happiest year in history. Let us start a Merry Christmas that will reach 'round the world and last till the candles are lighted on next year's trees. For the world stands in need of the gift of ourselves, not alone now, but always. The light of the Christmas star needs to shine upon us every dark night of the year. Love knows not seasons and where it dwells is always holiday.

Merry Christmas to each and all of you, then—this month and every month. I know you have heard me, for my ears are tickling already!

And now for the letters:

UNO PARK, ONTARIO, CANADA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Here comes something new—a cousin from Canada. I have never seen a letter from Canada in the Cousins' department, so I thought I would write and then maybe other Canadian cousins would write also.

As most of the cousins describe themselves first, I guess I will follow suit. I am five feet, six inches tall, weigh 130 pounds, have dark brown hair and blue eyes, and a medium complexion. I will be eighteen years old this coming April of 1923. There now, how do you like me?

I have four brothers and one sister. My sister is married but my brothers are all single. We live on a farm of over a hundred acres and grow grains and vegetables of all kinds, but no fruit. Our farm is situated on the banks of the Wahi River, five miles north of New Liskiard—which is our nearest trading town. This is all a very rolling country and a real good one for farming. Uno Park is just a small village, containing a store, post office, school, Methodist church and a railroad station. There are also quite a few houses. We have rather early winters here and we have also early frosts in the summer time which often spoil our garden. Next to New Liskiard, our nearest town is Haileybury. People call this the "rich man's town," as people who are retiring go and live there. Cobalt is next to Haileybury. It is a silver mining town and there is also a good market there every Saturday where all sorts of farm produce are offered for sale. Well, I guess if I don't stop describing our country you will all be moving up here and we would not have room for all of you. Then what would we do? But if this gets past Billy I will write again and tell you more of our wonderful northland.

I have taken COMFORT for two years in my own name, but my sister took it for years before she was married. When she went away I found I could not do without dear old COMFORT and I subscribed for it and am taking it yet. I surely enjoy reading the interesting stories, but the part I love most is the League of Cousins. I read all the letters, and your answers, Uncle Lisha, certainly makes me laugh. I think that if anything should happen to Billy one would be lost without him.

I liked Ruth's letter, and Dave of Washington, and Teddy Carmichael and them all, in fact. I sure had a good laugh at the Hermit of the Hills. I wonder if he got something to make his hair grow out again. I hope so, as he would look funny with his head devoid of hair as a toad's back!

As my letter is getting long I will soon have to quit. First, I would like if some of the cousins could send me the song, "Trail of the Lonesome Pine," and also the song, "In the Baggage Coach Ahead."

I wish COMFORT and all its readers, and also Uncle Lisha and Billy, the best of luck.

Will Augustus Trick, Hermit of the Hills and Ruth please write to me? And I'll hope to hear from other cousins as well.

Your loving niece and cousin,
ORPHIA LEVERRE.

P. S. Oh, say, Uncle! If you'll print this letter I'll send you a snapshot of myself in my baseball outfit. Uno Park girls have a girls' team. I'll send it in my next letter. Is it a go?

Orphia, I was glad to get your letter from the banks of the wild and rolling Wahi, telling us some of the things Uno about the part of Canada in which you dwell. But you must not think Canadian cousins are scarce, Orphia, even if they are scarce writers. I assure you we have oodles of members in our Maple Leaf Division. I don't know why they do not write oftener, unless it is their ink is frozen or they believe their letters would be held up for duty on the border. But I'm sure you will soon be hearing from plenty of northland neighbors and cousins—as well as some who dwell south of the icy Wahi.

Your town has a wise name, Orphia, and I'm glad it has a "few houses" in it. At first when your letter started to tell about it, I was afraid there were no houses at all and the unfortunate inhabitants had to roost in trees like guinea hens or turkeys. I should think it would be rather uncomfortable roosting in Canada—anyway along about February. I hope there are plenty of houses in Haileybury, this retiring town of yours, Orphia. I am a retiring sort of person and I might want to go up there and get retired. But I'm not going to roost in any tree, no matter what the retiring advantages of Haileybury are—and I'm pretty sure that Bill's objections would be stronger yet. Just how much wealth does one have to have to qualify for citizenship in this "rich man's town," Orphia? At my last inventory I had accumulated nine dollars, a Columbia half, seventy cents in assorted "shin plasters," and six dollars in Confederate bank notes. I also have a plugged three-cent piece and a cent of your Canadian government. Would these savings of mine let me in provided I was retiring enough? When you write to me let me know about this, don't forget that baseball photo. I think I would prefer one of you sliding for second or slamming a three-bagger out to right field. I'll have Bill start a Sporting Section in his Album.

SOMEWHERE IN MINNESOTA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Having read Mike's letter in COMFORT about farm life, I decided to tell what I think about farming: Farming is all right if parents work with the children—but not when they expect their children to work, work, with no pleasure, not even a pleasant word.

I can tell you that I have always lived on a farm all my life, and I can say that I'm an invalid and will be for the rest of my days,—and all caused by hard work.

I've a father that hates a doctor's bill. He knew I was sick for years, but wouldn't take me to a doctor till too late. Now I can never be well again. Do I like farm life? No. Do I like city or town life? I'll say No again. I prefer country to town because in a town you can rarely go any place but what there is some man to insult you. They say a girl is to blame; she is somewhat, but not all. I can say, though, it was a girl got me into a scrape I never want to be in again.

Now I'm no man-hater; but what I like is a man with a clean life—and you can't find but few. I haven't found any yet. Boys, brace up; lead the right sort of life, and you will find the girl you want to marry.

I suppose you will think I am some old maid and couldn't get a look from a man if I wanted to. You're wrong there, for I'm between 19 and 22 years of age—and called good-looking.

Your niece, PEACHES.

P. S. Uncle, I'll tell you my name, but don't you dare print it or I'll never forgive you.

Peaches, your letter hit me hard. I have known too many instances where parents have expected too much in the way of heavy farm work from their children—and often with crippling injury to health. Where physical hurt has not come, the unsuited, overloaded life has meant a loss of all of youth's naturally happy outlook, a repression of the healthy play instinct, a state of continual physical and mental fatigue which have meant unhappy changes all around and the leaving of marks on body and mind which future years cannot erase. A twig must not be too much bent. As old heads do not grow on young shoulders, so, too, young shoulders must not be expected to bear the work loads of adult years. Every child brought up on a farm should have certain duties to perform, should early be accustomed to bearing an interested part in all the busy many-sided life of a country home. But the work to be done by boys and girls must be wisely and justly allotted according to age and strength—and with time left for play, for study, for plenty of sleep, and for the natural rebounding elasticity of young bodies to have uninjured action and proper growth. Leading, direction and light burdens are right, but no heavy harnessing too early. It is just this too-young breaking in to the more difficult work of the farm which brings disgust and disallegiance to home and the land on the part of farm young people. Yet if parents are grasping, short-sighted, unloving—as some of them are, alas—sad results sometimes happen. Peaches, I am sorry for you and for all ways in which your body and heart have been hurt. I am sorry for your father—who has lost your love. Anything gained, or saved in the ways of which your letter tells, must be the surest possible loss—and with no chance of replacement.

TIFFIN, 97 JACKSON STREET, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am a very decided blonde (no peroxide), with dark blue eyes. I am twenty-six years of age. At present I am caring for an aged grandparent, and my vocation and future training will be that of a beauty specialist. Just now I am very lonely as I have few friends and my grandfather insists on having no noise. Will you, Uncle Lisha, kindly help me in this matter by asking your nephews and nieces to write me? Dear Uncle, you will be glad to hear that one of the very nicest penfriends I have had was a cousin. Excuse pencil, as I am no good with pen and ink.

Lovingly your niece, CONNIE JOHNSON.

Are you sure, Connie, that what your grandfather objects to is noise? When I read your letter I thought perhaps it was "boise" to which he was opposed. But probably it comes to the same thing in the end. For of course it would be hard to have your friends come and converse with you in whispers. Your mistake was in not picking out a deaf grandparent, but I suppose it is too late now to change. There might be a chance, though, of your finding some deaf-and-dumb "boise." These would make the quietest sort of callers and not at all disturbing to your grandfather's nerves. Well, I'm sure you are going to make a lot of lonesome-curing friends through our Big Family, Connie,—and these friends will not make one bit of noise, unless you take a notion to read their letters aloud.

I was delighted to hear you were going to be a beauty specialist, Connie. We can't have too much beauty and I'm glad you are going to specialize in increasing the lovely commodity. You might write to Cousin Gus Trick for a correspondence course on how not to begin this beautifying business. But, seriously speaking, I would like to send you a customer. This is my butcher on Utica Avenue. He has a wart on his nose which seems to get larger every year. He would be much more beautiful without this wart, Connie. But you'll have to cut it off when your grandfather is not about the house, for really I'm afraid this butcher chap is apt to let out a yell when you slice off the wart. It's about three-quarters of an inch at the base and rather firmly attached to his nose, I fancy, so one could not blame him for protesting a little when you start in to beautify him. Beauty cannot always be had without a little noise. How is your grandfather for beauty, Connie? Has he any warts? You might get permission to practice on him in his quietest moments. Perhaps if you made him more beautiful he might become more tolerant of noise and boise.

NUMEDHAL, NORTH DAKOTA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Will you admit a very little girl into your happy circle? I am four months old and two feet, one inch, tall. I weigh nineteen pounds and have blue eyes and medium brown hair. I live on a farm of 75 acres with my parents, three brothers and seven sisters.

Love to Uncle and all the cousins from Your little niece, RUBY VERNA HALVERSON.

I have heard there were good schools in North Dakota, Ruby, but I never supposed the cleverest of classroom artists could make anybody as young as you write so well. Why, your letter was ever so nicely done—and properly spelled—every word! I thought it most astounding. I showed it proudly to Billy and he grunted and said: 'It is entirely credible in Ruth, but not so exceptional as you seem to think, Uncle. I must remind you that the infant Macaulay is said to have written a leader for the London Times at the age of seven months and four days." But Bill never lets anything surprise him, Rubykins; he thinks it would be undignified.

Ruby, you have a lot of brothers and sisters of assorted sizes. I hope you will not get lost or mislaid among such a crowd of Halversons. Of course I am delighted to give you the tiny space you ask in our Big Circle. I hope you will write us another letter for each pound you gain in weight up to a ton and a half. And not another one of them shall Billy have a chance of seeing!

For You, Also

Prettier teeth—whiter, cleaner, safer

Look about you and you'll see glistening teeth on every side today.

Teeth which once were dingy now have luster. And women smile to show them.

The reason is this: A new way has been found to fight film on teeth, and millions now employ it. It is also at your command—a free test. So don't envy such teeth, but get them.

That cloudy film

There forms on your teeth a viscous film. You can feel it now. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

That film absorbs stains. Then, if left, it forms the basis of dingy coats, including tartar. That's why teeth don't shine.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Thus most tooth troubles, which few escape, are now traced to that film.

Now we combat it

Old methods of brushing are not sufficiently effective. So nearly everybody suffers from it more or less.

But dental science, after long research, has found two film combatants. Able authorities have proved their efficiency. Now leading dentists all the world over are urging their daily use.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, based on modern knowledge. The name is Pepsodent. These two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Two other effects

Pepsodent is based on modern dental research. It corrects some great mistakes made in former dentifrices.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's agent for neutralizing acids which cause tooth decay.

Thus Pepsodent gives a manifold power to these great tooth-protecting agents in the mouth.

Watch them whiten

Pepsodent will bring to any home a new dental era. Millions of people have learned this, and now enjoy its benefits.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

One week will convince you that you and yours should use this method always. Cut out the coupon now.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

asked the sisters to write to me. I got only one letter and Sonny Boy got hold of that and lost it, with the address, so Pearl won't you write again and give me your address.

Now that Mrs. Wilkinson has asked for Christmas present ideas I feel that I have something to say. I am working on my presents and here are some of them. Buy inexpensive handkerchiefs, or get the material and make them yourself. Put a border of checked gingham, about half an inch wide, around edges and embroider initial in one corner, using thread same color as gingham. Make collar-and-cuff sets of checked gingham. If you want to spend a little more, make a vestee to match. Have the set hemstitched or trimmed with lace. Find the middle of the vestee then take a little tuck on both sides of the middle, the long way. The space between tucks should be about two inches wide; hemstitch tucks or trim with lace, sewed on very full to make a ruffle. Sew little colored buttons on part between tucks. For a cap, take some plain gingham about a yard and a quarter long and nine inches wide. If you don't like your caps full, use only a yard of gingham. Make a narrow hem at the bottom and measure one inch from hem and sew on a bias strip of gingham, about half an inch wide, this is for the elastic. Sew together and fold cap so seam will be in middle of back and sew the top together on each side about three inches, then cut a little square to fit opening and sew it corner to corner. Put a little bow or rosette on front of cap.

Sisters, don't disappoint me again. Write a letter or send a card.

MARGARET CARMICHAEL.

Margaret.—I'll start the ball a-rolling by sending you a card.—Ed.

LUTZ, FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

How many of you sisters make your Christmas presents. I make pincushions of organdy or any fine white scraps and buttonhole the ends with pink thread and put two or three small tucks in the middle with pink thread.

Here is a way to make a pretty window shade. My shades began to tear at the bottom so I took unbleached cotton the length and width of the shade, cut pink flowers and green leaves from cretonne, and put them on at the bottom, made a hem for the stick, starched and ironed the cotton, tacked it on the same roller and it made a pretty shade. They can be made of different colors.

I have read several articles on better kitchens and if I ever have a home of my own I intend having my kitchen fixed up real cozy.

I am seventeen years old and have been married two years. My baby girl has brown hair and eyes. I am saving the Cubby Bear stories to read to her when she is older.

I would like to hear from West Virginia, sisters, as I came from there when I was eight years old.

Wishing you all happiness and prosperity,

MRS. D. E. DOZIER.

OTTUMWA, 910 RICHMOND AVE., IOWA.

DEAR SISTERS AND MRS. WILKINSON:

I started my Christmas presents last July as one cannot start too soon.

For my little friends I made slip-on aprons and appliqued animals on them and feather stitching or crocheting around the edge. I make these aprons from pieces left over from my large aprons.

It is hard to make things for men, isn't it? Last year I hunted up some of my brother's old ties and made a pillow top of them, working round all the blocks with different colored thread.

My motto is, "A place for everything and everything in its place." It saves lots of steps.

How many have a medicine chest? Mine is only a little wooden box that I got from the grocer but it serves the purpose. I have it nailed on the wall behind my bedroom door and keep all my medicines there. I covered it with cretonne.

Another step saver is a wooden candy bucket lid padded and covered with cretonne for a holder for scissors, needles, etc. I tacked a cushion near the top for pins and needles and below this at intervals I fastened hooks on which to hang spools and thimble. Arranged in this way, it can be hung up in any room.

Good by.

MRS. CHAS. LANGFORD.

SHAMROCK, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Begin your Christmas gifts early, otherwise there are friends and relatives that are left out for want of time.

I make animals, such as cats and dogs, out of outing flannel stuffed with cotton batting. A teddy bear made of brown flannel with red shoe buttons for eyes, will please the baby. For children I make little aprons of gingham and rompers and dresses of the same material. One year I made two dozen for relatives and friends. Make little sweaters for children. I enjoy the giving as much as receiving.

We have a beautiful place and when I get through or tired of my housework I can take baby, three years old, and go out of doors and watch our garden grow. Sisters who have gardens, can beans, beet pickles, cucumbers, chow chow, etc., for your city relatives and friends. They will appreciate such things so much. We live on a farm where we can raise our peanuts and pop-corn for Christmas. I believe I'll send Mrs. Wilkinson some.

Best wishes to all.

MRS. C. L. C.

SEVERN, R. R. 1, MD.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

My mother has taken COMFORT for a long time and I always like to try all the help hints and new ideas for Christmas presents, so I am writing you one of my own ideas for presents, also for pin money. This is for the country sisters who raise persimmons. Pick the seeds in the fall and clean by soaking and washing (do not soak in tin for they'll turn blue), and then let dry until wanted for necklaces. With a sharp knife, cut a little off both ends and soak in warm water a few hours or overnight; then take a large needle, but not too large else it will break them open, and stick holes through them lengthwise. They are then ready to string with beads. Take two small silver beads and one long (bugle) bead of red, green or blue, then two small silver beads and then the persimmon seed, and so on until the string is the desired length. You can make any color to match your dress. If you have girl friends in the city or at school you can soon get orders by making a few as advertisements. My mother has sold about two hundred and fifty. The cost is about eight cents, not counting the seeds or labor. At first you will think it a lot of work but after making a few it will come easy. I forgot to mention that you'll have to take a pair of pliers to pull the needle through the seeds when making the holes. Four o'clock seeds with steel and long bronze beads make a pretty chain.

Mrs. Wilkinson, you will find a string of beads enclosed for you if you care to keep them.

Have any of the sisters the story by Laura Jean Libby called "The Crime of Hallowe'en." I would like to get it. I started to read it a long time ago but the last half of the book was gone.

Yours truly, MRS. RICHARD REINECKE.

Mrs. R.—Indeed I do care to keep the beads and think it was good of you to send them to me. Thank you. The bronze beads blend beautifully (sounds as though I were trying to say "Peter Piper picked a peck") with a favorite brown dress of mine and have been much admired by friends.—Ed.

SCOBEY, BOX 322, MONT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Six years ago I tried to get in but maybe you folks don't like noise in your comfy corner and I have four noisy babies. But they are all busy and quiet at present. I am sending a picture of my baby boy, John Carlyle Beeks, and we think he's the nicest baby ever. He was just one year and one day old when this was taken.

JOHN CARLYLE BEEKS.

We live in a shack 12x32 feet in a new town on a branch line. I have a dear husband and we get along all right.

I made overalls for my boys out of their daddy's old ones, and little shirts from scraps of different kinds. Most of their stockings are made from old ones and their underwear, table-cloths, and many other things, are made of flour sacks. I do all my housework and sewing so you see I am busy. Still I have time for a lot of crocheting and many other things.

With the best wishes and a "Happy Christmas" to all,

MRS. FRANK LEEKS.

That's all right for you, Mister Johnnie, sticking your tongue out at us that way. I should think you'd be ashamed of yourself. Just for that you can't have any Christmas dinner. Maybe, though, if you are very good I'll see if there isn't something for you.—Ed.

KEYTESVILLE, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for a good many years and enjoy the Sisters' Corner very much.

I'm just a plain little country woman, five feet and two inches tall, dark brown hair and eyes and am thirty years old. I've been married nearly fourteen years to one of the best of husbands. I'm not trying to convince you that he's an angel, very few of earth's mortals are perfect, but I try to look over any faults that he may have, as I hope that he will look over mine, and in spite of sickness and financial reverses our married life together has been and is a very happy one. My heart is filled with sympathy for those who have uncongenial life companions, those with physical afflictions and those who grieve for loss of loved ones.

We have two little daughters, Nellie, twelve, and Virginia, seven. I'm always interested in the letters on the subject of raising children, which is, I think, a problem of grave responsibility.

As it will be nearing Christmas by the time this is printed, I will tell you of some things I made for Christmas last year. From a paper I cut the pattern of a galloping horse, twelve inches high. I placed the paper horse on a twelve-inch pine board and marked around it with a pencil, then with the saw and a knife I sawed and cut out the wooden horse. Then with the paper horse as a pattern I cut two more horses from dark gray outing flannel, allowing a quarter of an inch for seam, then I cut a long strip of outing, allowing about a half inch more than the thickness of the board. I sewed this strip all round one of the cloth horses, and from the bottom of the hind foot over the back and down to the bottom of the front foot of the other cloth horse, then I turned it right side out and put over the wooden horse, and with needle and thread whipped the remaining part of the seam together, drawing the cloth tight and smooth over the wood. Two big brass-headed tacks driven in the proper places make the eyes. I used hair for the mane and tail, but a fringe of heavy thread would do. Next I cut a board long enough for the horse to stand on and about four inches wide, to this I fastened the horse by nailing two-inch thick strips, one on each side of the feet in the center of the board. For the wheels I cut the ends from silkateen spools, putting a nail through the spool end, driving the nail into the edge of the board. I made a bridle of strips of an old kid glove tacked in place with small brass-headed tacks. I also made a saddle from cardboard covered with part of an old glove and put on in the same way. When finished it was really pretty, and it has seen many days of rough play and is still as good as new. I also make cloth doggies. Black satin or velvet make pretty ones, most all the money in the world isn't worth the of a good, true woman."

ne threw back his head and laughed.
What do you know about good women, Sid?" questioned jokingly, "you who have never vn any except those belonging to a very self- set."
That's true," admitted Sidney, "but all the e, I've known the love of one good woman in life."
And you gave her up——"
To marry money," supplied Sidney.
Tell me about it," said Zane., "maybe it will ease your mind."
'an't do it," answered Sidney, rising. "You ldn't understand——"
t the door he turned back. "Haven't been n to see Valesque's pictures yet, have you?"
No——"
Guess you better go down this afternoon; he's great fame in the last two years—so the ers say—and is having his art exhibit this rnoon."
I'm so glad," said Zane happily. "Old Val has ked so hard and has had such an unhappy ; maybe this success will help him in a meas- blot out the years of unhappiness he's lived ough. Have you seen the picture?"
No," answered Sidney, "but am going with my this afternoon."
The crowd was thinning out considerably when e made his appearance at the studio of his old nd, Valesque, who had won fame and fortune Zane's absence. Delighted to see his young nd, Valesque bade him wait in the sitting- m until the studio was empty of guests that might observe his new work in peace.
ane picked up a magazine to pass the time y, and presently was absorbed in a thrilling ry. Suddenly he became conscious of voices instantly recognized in one the voice of his ther, Sidney, the other was that of a woman.
What in the world," the woman was saying, d you see in the picture to upset you so?" as no more than a thousand other pictures ve seen before; anybody would think you had ortgage on the model and the baby."
Come away, come away," Sidney begged. "It's the picture but the warmth of the house that upset my nerves."
Poor old chap," murmured Zane as he watched couple depart a few minutes later, "I guess would be pretty tough sailing to marry for ney."
resently his musings were interrupted by the ist.
Come now," said Valesque, "we can take our n good time."
From picture to picture Valesque guided his st until finally coming to the prize picture of year he asked Zane to keep his eyes shut un- he bade him look.
Now," said Valesque joyously when he had ced the picture where the last rays of sunset l in golden splendor upon it, "you may look."
Zane opened his eyes and for a moment stood ring at the picture—speechless, spellbound— fore him was the prize picture of the year— young woman it was in a small boat on a sun- sea, a baby clasped close to her breast, and on r face the anguish of a hopeless heart. Be- ath the picture in softly blended colors was the le that clearly bore out the anguish of the autiful face: "The Forgotten Woman."
Suddenly he laid a trembling hand on the arm the artist and his voice shook with suppressed otion.
"Where, Val," he asked in a husky whisper, id you get that——"
"Why, Zane, old man, anyone would think I d brought the dead to life, by your actions."
"You will tell me about it?" Zane begged.
"Certainly," answered Valesque, "but it's far om a pretty story. Funny thing," continued lesque, "that picture affected your brother rangely this afternoon also."
Standing before the picture, Valesque told Zane e story of his prize picture; he was sketching ong the Virginia coast in the early spring more an a year ago, and in crossing Deed's Cove one abbath afternoon had found the young woman his prize picture just ready to cast herself and by into the sea. In tender tones he told how had persuaded her to listen to reason, and how fore she had explained her reason for the act, e kind-hearted fisherman overtook her and told r the Settlement was waiting to welcome her ck into their midst instead of crucifying her.
"The attitude so inspired me that I was never le to get away from it, and finally I decided paint the picture, and persuaded her to pose r me. And one day she told me the story. She ad married some man secretly, who deserted her ortly afterwards; the shock killed her old randfather and left her to face the coming of er child alone."
"You know the name of this deserter?" Zane sked huskily.
The artist shook his head. "She wouldn't tell e."
"And the girl," questioned Zane, "is—is she till at Deed's Cove?"
"Yes," responded the artist, "she is still there —peculiar sort of little thing—seems to be wait- ng for someone she used to know. I'm deeply in- erested in her, and would have brought her on o New York to share the joy of my success—but she wouldn't come."
Suddenly the hope that had risen in Zane's heart seemed to choke him—was he going to find Mary Deed only to lose her again?
"Are—are your interests in this girl serious?" he asked presently.
"Serious, all right, Zane, but not in the way you think. Perhaps you don't know—but I lost my wife and baby near Deed's Cove some twenty years ago when the ill-fated Pandora went down, and this girl is the very image of my wife."
Zane gripped his friend's arm and drew him to a nearby settee.
"It's possible, Valesque," he said thoughtfully, "that in The Forgotten Woman you have discov- ered your own daughter."
"My daughter—great God! Zane, don't talk like a lunatic. What do you know about this woman?"
Carefully, accurately Zane told him of the years he had spent in Deed's Cove—told how Mary wasn't the granddaughter of old Aaron Deed ex- cept by adoption; told how the old man had found her among the wreckage in a blue basket after the Pandora went down.
"And you," said Valesque, "what have you to say about the girl?"
"Me—why, I—I——" stammered Zane, "have loved her for years. I wanted her for my wife but before I declared my love to her she discov- ered she was in love with another man so I never went back."
"And this other man, Zane," cried Valesque, "must be found and punished."
Suddenly the color faded from Zane's face— clear as light he saw the truth—the man who had deserted the woman he loved was his step- brother. Sidney's gray hair, his declaration of love, his nervousness over the picture—every- thing pointed clearly enough towards the guilty party. There was no time to waste. Sidney had not only sinned against Mary, but had also com- mitted bigamy—he must make reparations. If Mary still loved him she should have him—no stint of money should keep them apart—but one thing was sure, he would see for himself that the girl should not be mistreated.
"I shall go to Deed's Cove immediately," he promised as he arose to leave.
"Make it day after tomorrow, Zane," begged the artist, "and I will go with you."
"Can't wait until then," Zane declared, "we might lost sight of her again."
"Then let it be noon tomorrow and I will ar- range to go also."
So it was agreed that the two would start to Deed's Cove the following noon, but Zane's work was not over. From Valesque he went direct to the home of his step-brother from whom he de- manded the truth.
"It wasn't that I didn't love her," Sidney ex- claimed over and over, "it was the mere fact that I needed money and neither of us had it, so I had to put her out of my life."
"But do you realize," said Zane, "that you are a bigamist—that the law can and will handle for you this thing you have done? It isn't Mary or your child that is nameless, but your present wife; she is the one you have lived with unlaw- fully. You know the marriage vows at Deed's Cove is but the admittance of accepting each other before a third party, that will hold good— it's Mrs. Sidney Creighton of New York that you have been living with unlawfully."
Suddenly Sidney began to laugh. "Serves her right," he murmured disgustedly. "She's stepped on me ever since I've been married to her—now I'll get even.
"But listen, Zane, don't tell her about it un- til I've had a talk with Mary; you know, Mary may not take me back—if she doesn't then I'll get a divorce from her on the sly, and my present wife will never know the difference."
"You can mark it down right now that Mary won't want you," said Zane, "but you're going to explain things to your present wife either way— and I'll give you twenty-four hours to begin action."
Without another word Zane was gone, leaving Sidney Creighton to himself. His present condi- tion was anything but pleasant, and Sidney Creighton, fearing that at last the long arm of justice was reaching out for him, restlessly paced his room far into the night, finally reaching a de- cision to go in person to Deed's Cove and see for himself how the land lay.
Suddenly it dawned upon him that the luxuries with which Mrs. Sidney Creighton's money sur- rounded him were of the sort from which he had no desire to be divorced, even for love's sweet sake, and in his heart he realized that he would go most any length to retain his present position, if he were forced to do so. The thought of hav- ing to pay for any of his misdeeds filled him with an almost insane rage—and it was in an ugly mood that he finally started for Deed's Cove.
'Twas scarce 6 o'clock by the sun-dial when Sidney Creighton made his appearance on the white sands of Deed's Cove, and yet the fisher folks had cast their nets and gone home. Only Jim Cody lingered at the water's edge, tinkering with his boat. Looking up suddenly, he beheld a dark, foreign-looking man with black Vandyke beard walking towards him.
"A stranger in Deed's Cove," thought Jim, and presently the two were chatting like old friends —but Jim Cody was never known to forget a voice, and in the stranger's tone detected an old familiar note, and while he couldn't fathom out just whom it belonged to, he decided the stranger would bear watching. Jim noticed with a peculiar sensation in his heart that the stranger kept his face turned towards the cabin that sheltered the woman he loved and his little son.
Jane had never forgiven him his villainy nor taken him back, though he had claimed her as his lawful wife and little Zach as his son—still, if danger threatened her, he wanted to be near.
Presently the door of the old Aaron Deed cot- tage opened, and Mary and little Zach, leading be- tween them a toddling curly-haired baby, came out and turned down the pathway leading to the shore road.
The last rays of the setting sun shone on Mary's face—a face of grave beauty and sweetness. Since her baby had been spared and her purity accepted that awful day, more than a year before, she had developed into a wonderful woman. At the shore road, just as in the old days, she was joined by Zane Bradley who had been walking along the white beach, and Jim Cody realized that whoever the stranger might be, he was interested in Mary.
"Just who might these people be at the cross- ing?" asked the stranger hoarsely.
"That's Mrs. Sidney Creighton and Zane Brad- ley," answered Jim, trying all the while to con- nect the voice of the man with someone he had known.
In this preoccupied frame of mind he failed to note the start the stranger had given at the men- tion of Mrs. Sidney Creighton. Getting no re- sponse, he pointed out another figure far down the beach.
"That is her daddy," said Jim. "Him and Mr. Zane just come today, and as soon as they can find Sidney Creighton she's going to get a divorce and marry Mr. Zane. She's just found her real daddy after being lost from him twenty odd years —and him and Mr. Zane is mighty big folks."
Presently Zane walked on to join Valesque, and Mary, coming down to the spot where Jim and the stranger were, stopped to speak to Jim.
"Jane is alone, Jim," she said softly, "and I think in a gentle frame of mind. Just for an ex- cuse you might run up and tell her that father and Mr. Zane will stay with us for supper."
At her approach the stranger had turned his face to the sea and walked down to the water's edge, and Jim, pushing his boat back in the water, smiled his appreciation at Mary for her kindness, and went to do her bidding, followed by little Zach, who no longer feared this big-fisted man for the two were now inseparable companions.
The cabin door had scarcely closed upon the man when the stranger wheeled, and pointing a revolver at Mary, ordered her to pick up the baby, get into the boat and make no sound.
Mary, thinking she had to deal with a crazy person, obeyed, and the stranger, stepping in after her, took up the oars and with a few swift strokes sent them out from the shore. Trembling with fear, Mary clasped her baby and waited for a chance to do something, and the man—rowing grimly towards the sunset—spoke no word to tell her of his plans. Finally, realizing the danger before her, she sprang to her feet.
"Who are you?" she cried angrily. "What are you going to do with me and my baby?"
Receiving no answer, Mary leaned toward the rower with a look of terror in her eyes—a feel- ing that she had encountered this man before —somewhere—and again she demanded an ex- planation.
The man gave an ugly laugh. "You won't be hurt if you behave—I'm just going to send you on a little trip 'round the world. My yacht is down at the Cove's mouth, and——"
With a swiftness that took him completely by surprise, Mary dropped the baby into the bottom of the boat and sprang for the revolver which he had placed beside him.
A short, sharp struggle followed, then some- thing flashed in the red sunset and buried itself in the waters of the sea. Before the man had time to recover from the first action, Mary made a lightning pass at his face, and when her hand came away her fingers were clutching the false Vandyke beard and bushy eyebrows, and Sidney Creighton was meeting her look of horror with one of cold fury.
"You beast!" exclaimed Mary. "You've learned that you are a bigamist and meant to kidnap us, did you?"
"My intentions are still good," snarled Sidney. "No one at Deed's Cove knew me—and one move from you will mean death in the sea," he threatened.
As if in answer to his threat, Mary turned her face towards Deed's Cove and sent a ringing cry for help across the water, then with a shrug of her splendid shoulders, she faced Creighton.
"Turn the boat over if you dare," she called defiantly. "You vile brute—you can't swim— turn it over!"
Sidney loosened his grasp on the oars, and a wave of fury swept over him. "I can drop you over," he cried angrily, "you and that damned brat, too, that has brought about the trouble— and I will unless you listen to reason."
But Mary was no longer afraid—she knew the waters of Deed's Cove—she knew the strength of her voice—somebody at Deed's Cove heard that cry—somebody would come to her rescue—her problem was to prevent Creighton from any dras- tic deed until help arrived.
As Mary suspected, the cry she sent across the water had reached the ears of willing rescuers. The artist, Zane Bradley and Jim as one man heard the call, and a moment later two boats shot out from the shore.
In one was Jim, in the other Zane—Valesque falling behind in the race for the boats. With sinking hearts both Zane and Jim watched as they plied their oars, the desperate struggle tak- ing place in the boat ahead.
Sidney, however, had placed a false estimate on the strength of the girl. To dispose of her was not an easy matter as he had supposed, her strength fully matching his own. She was a su- perb figure against the grey sky, fighting for her- self and her child.
Creighton, too, was desperate and fought sav- agely. Suddenly he caught sight of the pursuing boats, and realizing that it would all be up with him if caught, made one more frantic effort to rid himself of Mary, but her strength was too much for him. A moment more, the boats bore down upon him, and turning a look of livid hate on Mary and the child, he uttered a maniacal cry and threw himself into the sea, while Mary, slip- ping to her knees, caught her baby to her breast with a sob of Thanksgiving.
At that moment Zane drew his boat alongside, and transferring himself to the one with Mary, gathered both her and the child in his arms.
"It—it was Sidney," she faltered, "and—he— can't swim."
"Shall we save him?" asked Zane.
For an instant Mary stared at a hand thrust up in appeal a few yards away—then she nodded.
Zane spoke briefly to Jim, whose boat had also come close, and Jim's boat shot swiftly in the di- rection of the up-flung arm. But they were too late—Sidney had gone down in sight of her whom he had sought to destroy—and Mary Deed hid a shuddering face on Zane's shoulder.
"He was my stepbrother," said Zane briefly. "Five years I lived under a shadow because of him—he has left a trail of tears wherever he has gone—God be merciful to him—now!"

* * * * *

Again three people were gatherd around the fireside of the Deed cabin—Mary, Zane and Valesque—in Mary's hand was an old book, the diary of Aaron Deed. She handed the book to Valesque, open at an entry made many years be- fore, which read:
"December 19th, 1892.—This morning—after a night of storm—I found a little baby girl, which I have named Mary Deed, and which I shall keep until identified."
"It was on December the 18th that the ship went down," said Valesque. "My heart tells me you are my little girl, Mary."
"And mine tells me you are my father," re- turned Mary, her eyes filling with tears. "Al- most it seems I have too many blessings for one," she said solemnly.
Zane, who had been smoking, knocked the ashes from his pipe, and crossing to Mary's side, took her hands in both his own.
"And I," he said, "have too few. Confer a few of yours, Mary dear, upon me—yourself and—" he paused, there was a light patter of little feet, and Aaron Sidney Creighton toddled towards them out of the shadows—"and this little tike," fin- ished Zane.
"Oh, Zane,' cried the girl softly as she hid her face against his broad right shoulder, "my heart has been crying for your return so long—so long."
"I'll never leave you again," declared Zane, drawing the slender figure a bit closer to his heart. "We will be married right away."
"You must remember, Zane," reminded Valesque, "that I have but found my children, and not un- less you both come back to New York and live with me will I give my consent for this."
"Yes, daddy," cried the girl, "we will have to crowd in every minute with happiness to make up for all these lost years——"
The conversation was interrupted by a gentle tap at the door, and when it opened there stood on the threshold Jane, Jim and little Zach.
"She has married me all over, Miss Mary," an- nounced Jim proudly.
Mary looked swiftly from Zane to Valesque and back, then began laughing joyously, and giving Jane a friendly caress declared she was going to give her Deed's Cabin for a wedding present.
"Only we will not be gone for good," said Zane, "we'll be coming to Creighton Lodge, which be- longs to me, every summer."
With beaming faces the callers slipped away, leaving Mary with those who henceforth and for- ever would love and care for her—no longer a forgotten woman but one greatly beloved—Zane's eyes told her so as he drew her to him with one arm while the other encircled her child.
And Valesque, looking on, smiled contentedly and thanked God for his blessings.

Christmas Joys for Children

By Eveline Vance

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

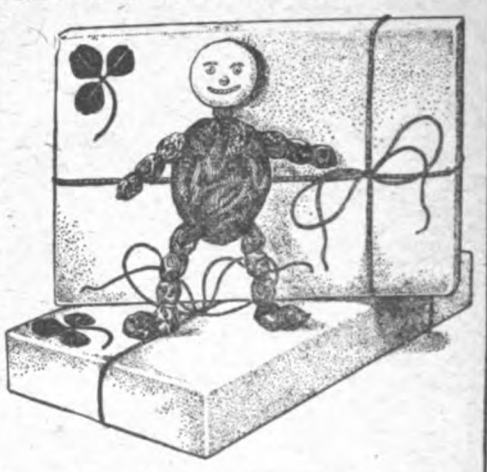
THE spirit of Christmas brings to childhood a season of happiness and enjoyment that remains unrivaled during the year. Bright faces fairly shine in their cherished belief that Santa Claus and Christmas are inseparable, and all the preparations and conspiracy which precede the eventful day hold them in a state of wonderment. It is during this impressive season that children should be given unusual freedom, so in later years, when the joyous circle is scattered and broken, the memory of merry voices, wild shouts, laughter and jests will win them back to the wonderland of the past and keep Santa Claus from slipping away; all so incompatible with the restless struggles of life.

And while centered about the pleasures we are to bestow on our children, let us not fail to teach the great truth that "Christmas is the birthday of one whose chief contribution to the human heart and mind was his message of boundless, universal love. He brought to the world the greatest thing in the world and that is why the season of his birth has won such an intimate place in our hearts."

If taught early in life that Christmas is only faithfully observed when we have given to the world something of ourselves and our possessions in return for all of His gifts to us, children will grow in wisdom and the current of their lives will carry hope and cheer as they journey onward.

Things That Children Can Make for Christmas

It is well to have the children do their part in the Christmas preparations as it teaches them the value of time and effort and thereby they will grow less selfish and exacting. With a little training, small hands can do a good many things. Among these are garlands for the Christmas tree, made by stringing on strong white thread first a kernel of popped corn and then a dark red cranberry until the required length is obtained. Another garland is made by stringing popped corn, dipping it into icing and hanging it to dry. It will produce a shimmering effect against the green.



Hemlock cones may be gilded with school paints and used to help decorate the tree. A rope of yellow or other bright color is made by twisting wide strips of crepe tissue paper around a stout cord. The rope can then be attached to the branches of the tree here and there and used simply as a bit of color, or it may be hung with cones, or used to hang handkerchiefs or other lightweight articles. Brightly polished red apples are hung by tying loops of twine to the stems and slipping them over the branches, and ruffles of fringed white tissue paper fastened by tying the gathering threads around the stems will give to them a festive appearance.

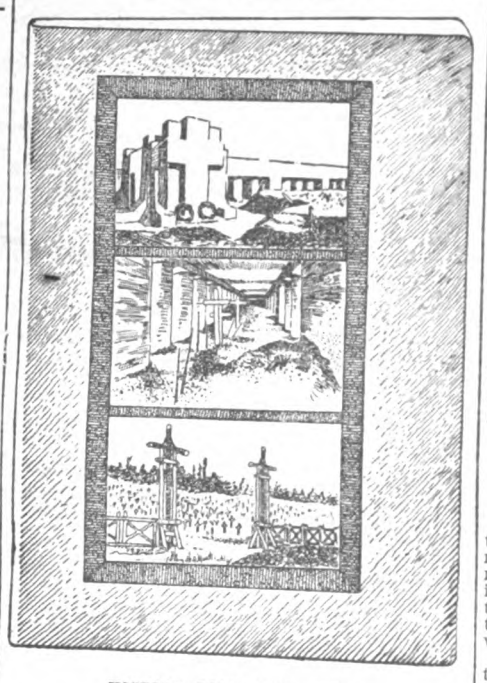
And while preparing your own Christmas tree, don't forget the hungry winter birds who would feast from a large piece of suet if it were tied to a tree.

Giving the Christmas dinner table a festive touch will bring the children to a closer understanding of how much mother does for them. Use an ordinary tablecloth that pins and a little pitch will not permanently injure, and let the children pin on flat pieces of evergreen below the table edge. Also stick on with flour paste a cut-out picture of Santa Claus just below the edge of table where father sits. This will make father feel very important. If you look through your old magazines you will find pictures of holly, evergreens, ribbon bows, dolls, toys and many other things suggestive of the holidays. Cut these out and paste them on the outside of plain dishes. If in black and white, take your school water-colors and color them, only don't use too much. On the bottom of each drinking glass paste a Santa Claus head which will appear magnified through the water as the glass is raised toward the eyes to drink from. If your Santa Claus heads give out, use some other head, first giving it a few lines to make it appear grotesque under the water.

Candied cranberries are delicious and closely resemble candied cherries. Spread the cranberries in a shallow agate pan and sprinkle with an equal amount of sugar. Place in a moderate oven for one hour or until they look clear and candied. Remove each one with a toothpick to a piece of oiled paper and dry. A cake decoration that children will enjoy making is to pop corn, and choose the kernels that are the whitest and largest. Take a tiny clean brush and tint the highest edges of each kernel with beet juice, using only a little at a time. Slightly press these kernels into the soft frosting around the edge of a cake and see what a pretty effect you have given it.

You are probably wondering what the funny little man that stands on the candy box is made of. Well, I will tell you. He has a marshmallow head, a raisin neck, a prune body, and raisin arms, legs and feet. If you are going to make some, first prepare your boxes. Just one makes a cute surprise for a little friend. Use toothpicks to hold the parts together. Paint the marshmallow face with beet and carrot juice, and outline his eyes and a little scraggly hair with the charcoal from a burnt match. In this way the marshmallow will not be spoiled for eating. If you have no marshmallows, dip a firm piece of jelly into frosting and decorate for the head.

CANDY BOXES—CONFECTIONERY MAN.



History Post Card Book

Since all the children are learning new geographical boundaries, and historical postcards are finding their way into most homes, starting a book with this class of cards will make a most acceptable gift. The one here pictured is simply a brown covered composition book such as children use in school. Every other leaf is carefully cut out to within one inch of the binding so as to allow space for the thickness of the cards. Three cards are glued to the cover and edged with a narrow strip of strong paper, glued flat.

These particular cards pictured on the cover are of intense interest to our boys and girls old enough to study history. The upper one represents a monument in Thiaumont which was built by an American aviator over the trench in which a lot of French soldiers were buried, as they stood with bayonets fixed for a charge, by the explosion of a shell.

The center card shows the original trench beneath the monument. There the soldiers lie buried with their bayonets sticking out of the ground just as the earth thrown up by the exploding shell fell upon them.

The lower picture is of a French cemetery in Verdun. The black crosses mark the German graves, and these bodies have not been claimed by Germany, who buried most of her dead so that the number killed in battle would not be known.

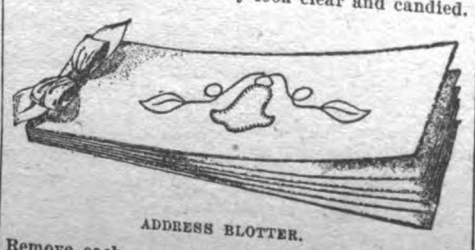
Toy Compartment Bag and Other Novelties

Among the new wrinkles for children is the toy compartment bag, which is a vast improvement over the toy drawer, where, thrown hit-or-miss, the toys become broken and are soon an uninteresting sight to children. Little girls in particular, enjoy putting their house in order, and to them this toy bag becomes a veritable house with rooms for all purposes.

The early love of mystery which surrounds anything concealed is another advantage over the toy drawer, for it satisfies the child's desire to investigate, and old toys brought to light after being hidden some days will bring the pleasure of meeting old playmates.



To make this toy bag, two strips of wood, plain denim and three screweyes with corresponding hooks are the necessary materials. In design the bag is planned the same as our old friend the shoe-bag, with pockets to meet the requirements of the individual set of toys. In this particular bag the top row of pockets is assigned to the doll family, an arrangement which assures good order while the little mother takes one away for an outing.

COMPARTMENT BAG FOR TOYS.

On each pocket an animal is drawn and outlined in red cotton. If one has a stamping outfit, more elaborate designs may be used, providing they are of a nature to interest children.

The blotter is called an address blotter because it is long and narrow. Cut several blotters the desired size, lay them together, pierce two holes through the whole, at one end, about an inch apart; draw a ribbon through and tie. Use any desired decoration. Using a colored blotter for the outside ones with a ribbon to match makes a prettier present.

That was how they got start.

G. G. Begalke

By G. G. Begalke

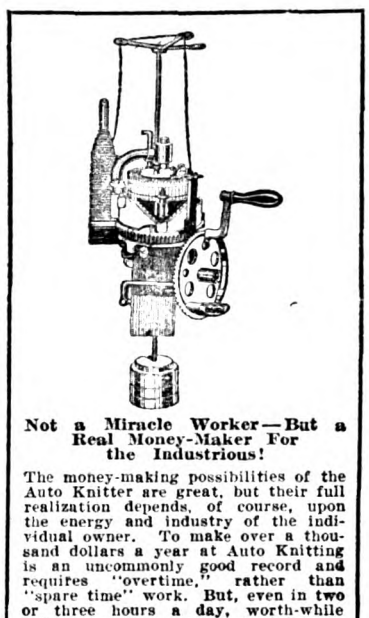
VER since my wife and I have been married, it has been our desire to have some kind of an automobile, but as time went t never seemed possible for us to realize wish.

hen our children came, expenses of course eased. We now have three, the oldest eight, youngest two, and the care of this growfamily has always made it out of the ques- for us to save enough money from our lar income to buy an automobile.

inally we concluded that we must find some to earn extra money in our spare time, so started looking for a home occupation that ld enable us to add to our bank account.

We found nothing very promising until last ober, when I noticed a full page advertiset in the Sunday paper, telling how people our circumstances made money at home in re time by knitting socks on the Auto tter. I called my wife's attention to the ertisement, and she said it was almost too d to be true, but we were both so interested t we decided to find out more ut the work, and mailed the pon from the ad.

Ve received by return mail e literature explaining the position thoroughly, and we ame convinced by reading it t the Auto Knitter Hosiery mpany was offering us a gene money-making opportunity. aid to my wife, "If others do it, why not we?" So h her consent I sent a money ler and we awaited the ar- al of the Auto Knitter ma- ne.



Just before Thanksgiving the pressman delivered it to our use, and that evening we ened it and found the machine be just as represented. The truction book was also too ar and plain to be misunderod, so I became convinced at we had indeed found the y to make the extra money r our long-desired automobile.

To make a long story short, soon learned to make standd, salable wool socks, and we are now glad say that in the four and a half months we ve used the machine we have turned out 80 pairs of men's socks; part of these we ld to the company under the wage contract, d part we sold to private customers at $1.00 $1.50 a pair. My wife just went from use to house a couple of times, displaying mple socks, and after that people began com- g to our house to order socks. Sometimes e had to hustle to fill our orders.

And finally, after the knitter and a stock of ool was paid for, we had a net balance of 536.56 clear profit for our work. On Washington's Birthday I celebrated by buying a brand new Ford Sedan, and our long-time wish came to be a fact, thanks to the Auto Knitter and the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company. So now we have our car, bought with the extra money we made at home, in spare time.

My wife and I often speak of that full-page advertisement we answered, and all that it has meant to us since. If we had not invested in the Auto Knitter we should never have been able to buy a car, but by turning our spare time into real cash right at home, it was so easy that now we are going on earning until we have a piano too.

Not a Miracle Worker—But a Real Money-Maker For the Industrious!

The money-making possibilities of the Auto Knitter are great, but their full realization depends, of course, upon the energy and industry of the individual owner. To make over a thousand dollars a year at Auto Knitting is an uncommonly good record and requires "overtime," rather than "spare time" work. But, even in two or three hours a day, worth-while dollars can be made, and our Work Contract guarantees you a market for every standard sock you knit. The Auto Knitter will work just as fast and long as you do yourself, and your pay will always be in proportion to your industry and skill.

Why Not Satisfy YOUR Wants Through Auto Knitting?

Even though you may have no actual need to earn money, how pleasant it would be to do so, wouldn't it? To sit down for a couple of hours in the evening at a light occupation that is really more fascinating than embroidery or crocheting, and to know that every bit of standard work you turn out has a steady, always-ready market waiting for it—that is real satisfaction!

That is the advantage which thousands of women, yes and men too, now enjoy because they have learned to make a standard pattern of all-wool socks—on a handy little home-operated machine called "The Auto Knitter."

If you too had an Auto Knitter you could turn your spare moments into steady earnings that would rapidly grow into really worth-while sums of money—to be used for clothes, home-furnishings, savings, or any of the hundred-and-one needs and wants that keep presenting themselves often unexpectedly, when your family income is already strained by regular expenses.

When an Auto Knitter owner needs extra money, she simply gets busy making standard socks on her machine, sends a shipment of them to the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company and in a few days she has the money—in the form of a "check from Buffalo."

"The check from Buffalo" is a welcome visitor in thousands of American homes—and it pays for all sorts of extra comforts, pleasures and little luxuries. This money is used to help pay for new homes—to buy new furniture—to start bank accounts—to help educate children—to pay vacation expenses—to buy vacuum cleaners, kitchen cabinets, washing machines, phonographs and farm machinery—to start mushroom and chicken raising businesses.

More Than $100,000 a Year Being Paid to Workers

The total number of socks being sent in to us by Auto Knitter workers this year will reach over 1,000,000 pairs, and the total amount of wages sent them in "checks from Buffalo" will exceed $100,000. This will give you some idea of the extent of this spare time industry that the remarkable Auto Knitter machine has made possible to American homes everywhere.

This immense number of pairs is received at the factory, sorted, shipped to more than 9,000 dealers in all parts of the country, including department stores, men's furnishers and general stores—and sold under the trade name "Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks."

Yet out of this large number of socks received, from novices as well as experts, from new workers as well as old —less than 5% have to be laid aside and returned as being below the standard set for "Old Tyme All-Wool Socks."

Each Worker Protected By a Contract

You are given a signed Five-Year Work Contract, guaranteeing you a market for every pair of standard Olde Tyme Socks you produce, and fixing a definite price which you will be paid for your work, in addition to which you will be furnished with yarn to replace, pound for pound, that which you send us in the form of socks.

You can work as much as you please or as little as you please—and the standard product you complete can be disposed of promptly and profitably to the company. You are not compelled or obligated in any way to send any part or all of your work to the company unless you wish. You can make socks and sell them to your friends, neighbors and local trade. But if you prefer not to canvass or do any selling—then it is always your privilege to send your standard socks to us and receive our fixed rate of payment, together with replacement yarn.

Beauty Gifts for Christmas

PRETTY Girls at Christmas-time ought to be thinking how to pass along a little bit of beauty. And it is an easy thing to do. There are dozens of Christmas presents that are delightful to receive and a distinct addition to one's toilet table. And many of them are quite inexpensive, requiring only a little thought, time and ingenuity.

Gifts of this type used to be confined to manicure sets, and it certainly isn't likely to disappoint a girl if she receives a delicately curved pair of manicure scissors at Christmas-time, or a bundle of orange-wood sticks, tied together with a dainty ribbon, like a bunch of faggots. While toilet water, and a spray to use it with, is sure to please, and even a bath powder shaker—one of the tin or aluminum ones with a handle, sold for sugar shakers, and enameled some dainty color—filled with a perfumed talcum, will meet with approbation.

But let me tell you of some pretty, useful and novel gifts which you can make at home for a very small sum. First, some "beauty bags." These are intended to take the place of a wash-cloth, and to much greater advantage, and I have recommended them to my girls for their own personal use many and many a time. But for Christmas, let's add a few extra touches. Invest in a yard of rather closely woven cheese-cloth, and cut it up into pieces about six and one-half inches by four. Turn a seam one-quarter of an inch wide all around this strip. Now, fold it once in the center of the long way of the material. With mercerized cotton in pink or blue or lavender—whatever color best suits your friend's fancy—use the buttonhole stitch to catch together lightly two edges of the folded material, leaving the other edge open like the opening of a bag. Half fill this little case with rolled oats, then buttonhole the remaining opening, and the folded side, making a dainty little padded square, buttonholed on all four sides. It will be about three inches by three and one-half. Prepare a dozen of these and pack in a box, lined with tissue paper cut large enough to fold over the contents, then wrap box in tissue and tie with colored raffia strands or paste together with Christmas seals.

Another gift which will prove a real boon to any woman, is a little pack of flannel squares to use in wiping cold cream off the face or in applying powder. Pink the edges of the little square with a pinking iron if you have one—if not, then pink it with a pair of sharp scissors. This is nothing more or less than snipping the edge into tiny points. The squares should be about three by three inches in size, and should be packed in little piles, fifteen or twenty in a pile, and tied with baby ribbon ending in a rosette in the center of the pack. The flannel used should be very soft French flannel, and preferably white, though the ribbon should be pink or blue or lavender, or some Christmas-y pattern.

The "beauty bags" are used in place of a wash-cloth, but should be only dipped quickly into and out of the water, not soaked in the bowl. With this wet bag, the face should be washed as with a cloth. A milky liquid will ooze out of the thin cheese-cloth covering. The face should not be rubbed, but patted dry. A white powdery substance is left, which should be gently smoothed with a puff of cotton. This makes the skin white and soft, and cleanses thoroughly. If well dried after using, a bag may be used a couple of times.

Answers to Questions

OKLAHOMA.—I am sorry that I cannot reply to your letter by mail. The rules of this department require all letters to be answered in its columns. You are certainly much under weight. You need to gain forty pounds. That means a lot of perseverance on your part, for you cannot gain without keeping everlastingly at it. Of course the physical condition to which you refer would keep you pulled down in health. What does your physician say. You say, "I hope I won't be asked to drink milk." Well, I won't ask you, but that is the very best way for you to gain. I used to "hate" milk, too, and when I took the milk diet at one time, I had to retire behind a screen when drinking a glass, it made me so nauseated. But I persevered, and finally it meant no more to me than a drink of water. If you should decide to be courageous and take milk, you must drop everything else in the way of food, and be sure to take the full quantity of milk prescribed. But, first, I will tell you how to eat to gain, without using milk. It is slower, however, much slower. To begin with, if you are to get the proper nourishment from your food, it must be properly cooked and properly chewed. Proper cooking eliminates all fried foods, for food coated in grease, as fried food is, is difficult of digestion. The stomach juices cannot get at the food to digest it, being prevented by the greasy coating, and it takes them much longer to overcome this obstacle. Do you see? For breakfast you should not eat any heavy foods, such as potatoes, hash, meat of any kind, but should eat only fruit—always some fruit—plenty of cereal with cream or milk, buttered toast, and two soft-boiled eggs, say eggs boiled about three and one-half minutes. For fruit you can eat prunes that have been soaked all night in plenty of water, then cooked slowly for at least an hour, without sugar; or a baked apple, apple sauce, sliced oranges, half a grapefruit, dried apricots soaked all night and cooked as the prunes were cooked, a raw apple—or canned peaches or apricots if not too sweet. For cereal, cook some oatmeal a long time, or use other cooked cereals, or the uncooked which have been heated in the oven, and be sure to eat plenty of cream or milk with them. I should be sparing of sugar, and it wouldn't hurt you to go without it on cereal. For dinner, you should eat some meat, broiled or baked, not very well done, and chewed until liquid; a huge baked potato dry and mealy, with plenty of butter, some other vegetables such as canned corn warmed with milk, baked Hubbard squash, tomatoes heated with bread-crumbs, etc., whole wheat bread and butter but no hot bread or biscuit. Soup is good for you, and for dessert you should eat simple things like baked custard, corn-starch blanc mange with cream and sugar, baked apple, ice cream, rice pudding, etc. Don't eat rich pudding sauces, or rich preserves, or any pie, or rich cake. When your weight is down as far as yours is, the stomach is not very strong and needs to be given simple foods to digest so that it will get out of them the nourishment they contain. About half an hour before you go to bed, eat a dish of warm boiled rice with sugar and cream; this is one of the best ways to gain in weight. In cooking the rice have a large kettle of boiling salted water and sprinkle in the rice a little at a time so that the boiling does not stop. If you have a quantity of water, there will be room for the grains to be whirled around and around through the whole process of cooking, and each grain will be separate when you finally pour the water off, instead of being a sticky, starchy mess. To stop the drain on your system to which you refer, try at such times to avoid all unnecessary activity. Lie down as much as you can, then, keeping off your feet. In other words, look after yourself and use your head to save your feet, for every action means a drain on your system. In answer to your other question, "vitamines" are food elements, and are contained in proper foods. Everybody gets them in food; some foods are richer than others in them. I should go to a good physician and in the meantime would live as sensibly as possible, choosing right foods, getting all the sleep I could, and avoiding every drain on my system. Now, about the milk diet: it would be a wonderful thing for you as milk is easy to digest and contains in almost perfect proportions all the elements the body needs. But it is no use starting it unless you do so with every intention of being faithful to directions and omitting all other food, except for the first week. To take it, first go without food for a day, drinking plenty of water, and eating fruit—six prunes in the morning which have soaked all night in a tumbler of water; then during the day more cooked prunes or an orange, etc. See that the bowels move thoroughly. Then the next morning on rising drink a glass and a half of water, sipping it slowly as you dress, not gulping it down. Fifteen minutes later eat half-a-dozen prunes that have been soaked all night, and drink the water. Be sure you chew the prunes until they are liquid. Half an hour later, drink a glass and a half of milk, sipping it slowly and holding it in the mouth before swallowing—almost "chew" it. In another hour take another glass and a half of milk, and continue doing this, an hour apart, until about three or three-thirty. Between this hour and your evening meal, drink a couple of glasses of water. For your evening meal, eat, say, some vegetables, a dish of rice with cream and sugar—or a bowl of soup and crackers, and a baked apple. Between dinner and bedtime, drink a couple of glasses of water. Continue this treatment for a week, at the end of which time you should drop your evening meal and take a glass and a half of milk every hour from, say, eight o'clock in the morning until and including seven at night. Keep up your prunes in the morning, and your water night and morning. If the bowels become constipated, physicians frequently recommend the little lapactic pills your druggist can furnish you, but it would be infinitely better if you could get along without anything except the prunes. Weigh on the morning of the first day and the afternoon of the last day of each week. You should gain from one to five pounds per week. I think you could get up to one hundred pounds in six weeks, and to one hundred and twenty pounds in possibly six weeks more. But that is only if you absolutely follow instructions, and also are careful to do as much lying down as possible when needed. It is really imperative that you take some action to build yourself up, and at once. About the bobbed hair, that is "going out"; all the newspapers and magazines are full of ads. of "coronet braids" or other devices to conceal bobbed hair, so don't bob yours now when everybody else is repenting. Your hair will thicken when your body has something to feed it; it is thin because it gets no nourishment. As to the proprietary beauty remedies you mention, it is against the rules of this department to express an opinion upon such things, but it is a safe thing to say to you that the only way in which you can improve your appearance satisfactorily is to do it from the inside out, for you simply must add weight; it is essential to your health, and with the addition of weight and strength, your complexion, figure, hair and everything else will show a big improvement. Good luck to you!

USING A BEAUTY BAG.

E. S. H.—I do not know what is the cause of the white spots on the hands. It would be impossible to tell at this distance. Have you asked a physician. Sorry not to be of use.

VERMONT.—You gave no pen name, so I am answering at random and hope you will realize this is for you. Ninety pounds! Of course you need building up. See what I have said to "Oklahoma," who weighs even less than you and has some special physical conditions to combat as well. Follow all the directions I have given her, and you will come out all right. There is no use in giving you exercises for the calves of your legs, or for the development of your bust, etc., for these depend first of all on added nourishment. When you have built yourself up to one hundred and thirty pounds I am sure you will not need any help about the other matters, so get right at it, won't you?

WEST VIRGINIA.—You shouldn't feel forty, when you are so young. I expect you aren't very well. I see you are married, and you are pretty young to have such responsibilities. Now, let's make up our minds that you aren't going to be ugly at all. I feel sure you aren't and that you yourself will know you are not when you begin to take a little care of yourself. First, pimples and blackheads come from two things improper food, and bowels that aren't functioning properly—or, rather, from three things, for blackheads are nothing but pores that have become filled with dust and have not been properly cleansed. So let's start right in. First, see that your bowels move every day, without cathartics. Food will help this, and exercise will also. Food will overcome the pimples, as well. Do not eat pie, cake, rich gravies, fried foods. Chew all your food until it is liquid. For breakfast, eat what I have recommended to "Oklahoma." Drink in the course of the morning two or three glasses of water. Do the same in the afternoon. Eat much the same meal at noon that I have recommended to "Oklahoma," though this somewhat depends on your weight. If it should chance that you are over-weight, cut out potatoes and rice and white bread and butter, but whatever weight you are, avoid hot biscuits, bread, griddle-cakes, etc., salt pork or other greasy or fried foods. Try to eat soft-boiled eggs, vegetables, fruit, and plenty of the latter; this will clear up your skin. Take an entire body bath every day. Even if you have no bath-tub, this need not be a great undertaking. A bowl of good hot water, and soap, with another bowl for rinsing water later will do the deed. Slipping on a night-gown or wrapper, bathe one arm, and dry, then the other, then face and neck and shoulder, then one leg, then the other, rubbing each part dry as you wash it, and covering it up so you cannot get chilled; finally the trunk of the body quickly but thoroughly, and you will be as clean as possible, all the little pores rid of impurities and stimulated to action. See that your underclothes are changed frequently, and, in other words, keep the skin and everything next it sweet and fresh and clean. Wash your hair once in two weeks with water in which good white household soap has been dissolved. Rinse the hair many times and dry in the sun. Brush it each day, not hard but gently and as if you were brushing beauty into it—as you will be. Keep your teeth well brushed. Brush them every night before you go to bed, using some good toothpaste or powder, and again in the morning when you rise, so that your mouth will be perfectly sweet and wholesome. Indeed, you should brush your teeth after every meal, but night and morning makes a big difference in your appearance. Keep your nails well brushed, filed and cleaned, and use something softening on your hands—either a hand lotion or put bran in the water in which you wash your hands. If you have rainwater for washing, that will be good for your skin. Don't use soap too often, for it dries up the skin—by that I mean don't wash your hands every little bit, using a lot of soap each time. They may only need a wiping off with a damp cloth, some of the time. Begin to think well of yourself, for more than half of beauty lies in thinking well of one's self. If you keep teeth, nails, skin and hair perfectly clean and well cared for, and everything about your clothes neat and clean, you will soon begin to be proud of yourself, and your face will take on new expressions. "Crows'-feet" aren't disfiguring. Sometimes they mean nothing but a love of fun, sometimes they mean that the skin has been allowed to get too dry and that the weight has fallen off: a few more pounds in such cases pads out the skin and stretches it so that the crows'-feet disappear. Use a little cold cream on your face either at night or during the day. It need not be disfiguring. In fact you should rub some in at least once a day to keep the skin soft. Just put a little on your finger-tips, apply it to your cheeks and rub it all over the face, rubbing it well into the skin so that it will all be absorbed. Always apply cold cream before putting on powder, but be sure to wipe off the surplus grease with a pad of cotton or a bit of soft cloth. The reason for applying cold cream before powder is that powder is drying to the skin. Now, brace up, take another look at yourself, and get to work at that skin. You are only nineteen and have a long time ahead of you to be very good looking, I am sure you will when you make the most of your natural possession. You know, yourself, that a good skin will make all the difference in the world, my dear, anybody can have a good skin if they will work after it, so it is merely a matter of a little time and that trouble of yours is entirely overcome.

IOWA.—I am sorry, my dear, but there is no way to restore bleached hair to its natural color. You will have to grow out and grow and grow until you have your natural colored hair to cut off the bleached. The reason in bleaching it, you have probably taken away the natural oil and that is why it is falling out. The only thing you can do is to shampoo it regularly, every two or three weeks, brush it gently every day, massage the scalp each night and morning, sleep with your hair loose, air it in the sun when you can, and above all seek to build up the health of its roots. As to restoring color, there is no way to alter it except by dyeing, and that is a hazardous proceeding, even in the hands of an expert. I wish I could give you more encouragement.

FARMER'S WIFE.—Your hair is thin because it does not get, or has not received in the past, enough nourishment. With as many children as you have, each one has been a drain upon your system, and since the birth your hair needed careful attention which probably did not get it, as most mothers are apt to forget of self. The only thing you can do now is to stimulate the scalp to stimulate the roots, apply a tonic for the same reason, but most of all feed your body so that you will put you well up to weight? Eat plenty of eggs—a couple each morning. Eat baked potatoes, mange, cream, milk, etc., etc. There is a tonic cure which many people use; it isn't a does seem to make the hair grow. In the beauty parlors they put it on and let it stand for two hours, then shampoo the hair, but the best way is to saturate the hair and scalp with it, and massage day or night—with the head tied up in a towel. To do this at night-time then shampoo the next morning. This is the best thing for the scalp where the roots are not dead. If your hair is thin be careful not to pull it when massaging. Slip the fingers under the hair next the scalp and press firmly so that they move back and forth on the hair but merely move the scalp on the skull. If the scalp is tight, the hair will be unhealthy, so manipulate it as above directed to get it loose on the skull. Go over every portion of the head in this manner, morning and night. Are you accustomed to brushing your hair straight back from the forehead, especially at the temples? This is responsible for much thin hair about the forehead. Change your way of brushing your hair. If you now brush it back from the forehead, at least part it at one side and comb the back part by itself, then gently brush the front part loosely and pin where you desire. Now, when you brush your hair brush it down toward the forehead instead of away from it, then, with a comb, put it in the way you want it to go, but never brush the front hair in with the back so that it is straight from the forehead. Handle it by itself, and arrange it as you want it, with no strain on the roots. A tonic that is recommended for the hair is as follows, but it never takes the place of proper treatment of the hair, the proper care of the body itself, for the hair is but an outward sign of its nourishment from the body as a whole.

The Falling Hair

Glycerine four ounces, tincture of cantharides half ounce, rectified spirits one pint, subnitrate of bismuth one-half ounce.

Use a soft baby brush and brush the thinning parts three times each day for about five minutes, working the lotion and let it dry in. Be very gentle with the brush on these thin spots.

"But I thought your wife was away."—Portland Express.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half a pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ½ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. It will gradually darken streaked, faded or gray hair and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.—Advt.

Brownie's Triumph

'or the first time in her life she was gracious e, and, bearing her no ill-will, I chatted freeith her for quite a while.
Have you danced much?" she asked, holding her hand for my card.
Several times,' I returned, with a smile, as I
it up to her.
he ran her eyes hastily over the names, and uld see her scowl every time she read Roy's.
, suddenly looking up, she exclaimed, aghast:
Why, Miss Douglas, will his lordship permit to dance with the Count de Lussan?'
he form of the question nettled me exceed-
, and I replied, somewhat haughtily:
His Lordship will permit me to dance with nsoever I choose, Miss Capel.'
he laughed a silvery, wicked laugh, and fix-her bold black eyes upon me, said, in an ex-rated way:
'ardon me, Miss Douglas, but I do not believe t Dunforth, who is very arbitrary when once will is aroused, will permit his betrothed to e with anyone who bears the reputation
h Count de Lussan bears.'
'But your own brother introduced me to him,
Capel!' I exclaimed indignantly.
'Charles? I'm astonished at him; but I pree the count asked him and he did not like to se. Why, he is a notorious blackleg, and how ver gained admission here is more than I can was startled at this intelligence, but I would show it before her, nor yield one iota; and ing up at that moment, I saw Lord Dunforth

Count de Lussan both approaching me.
Miss Capel remained by my side, evidently des of seeing the little game played out.
The count reached me first, and bowing low,
ed me his arm, saying his turn had come.
I glanced nervously into my lover's face as I tatingly took the count's arm, fearing that all not right, and my heart stood still as I noted expression of blank dismay and stern dis-sure.
He hastened forward, and taking my card, ily scanned the names upon it, and his brow dark with wrath as he read Count de an's against a waltz.
Bowing haughtily to my companion, he said,
compressed lips:
'Excuse me, but I must ask you to release lady from her promise to dance with you.'
The count's eyes flashed fire, and his face crimson as he answered coldly:
'I cannot do so, my lord, except at the lady's request.'
'She does request it through me—by my de-
' replied Lord Dunforth sternly.
'Miss Douglas, do you command me to release
?' asked the count, turning to me with that e disagreeable smile upon his lips that I had there when he had written his name against waltz.
'Tell him yes, Meta. I cannot allow it, and give you my reasons the first opportunity,' spered my lover in pleading tones in my ear.
I was on the point of yielding. Oh, why was blind that I did not? I had half withdrawn hand from the count's arm, when I heard a mocking laugh near by.
Glancing up, I saw Helen Capel watching ry motion, catching every word and tone, a le of mocking triumph on her handsome face.
In an instant I remembered my boast to her,
t 'Lord Dunforth would permit me to dance
h whomsoever I chose,' and in that fatal mont I resolved to show her my power over him;
t I had a will of my own.
Lifting my head a trifle haughtily, I said:
'My lord, I have promised Count de Lussan
t I will waltz with him, and I cannot break word.'
'Meta, Meta, don't do it!' he begged in a isper.
'I must,' I answered coldly.
'I command you not!' he said in a tone which count caught and curled his lip in scorn.
I bowed coldly, all the antagonism in my nae aroused by his command, then turning to companion I said:
'The music is inspiring, count. I am ready,'
l encircling my waist with his arm he whirled into the midst of the giddy dancers.
I had always loved to waltz; but, oh! how I e hated it since then. And this is the reason, r, why I would never allow you to learn. It not decent for young girls to be encircled in arms of men of whom they know nothing.
As we waltzed I became aware of strange, sursed glances following us; whispered words of isure greeted my ears, and a tremor of uneasiss took possession of me, which merged into abute terror when I reached the spot where Lord nforth still stood.
He was like a piece of statuary, his noble w overcast and his fine lips white and set as in pain.
"Count de Lussan released me, thanking me for e great pleasure I had given him, and then ved away.
"My lover did not speak one word to me until e music struck up again and the attention of e people around us was attracted in other rections.
"'Will you oblige me by withdrawing from the mpany?" he asked then.
"I arose at once and took his arm.
"'Oh, Roy, what have I done?" I exclaimed, deep distress at his coldness, my heart thrill-
g with a terrible pain.
"'You have disgraced yourself and me—the unt de Lussan is the lowest blackleg in London.'
"I lifted my eyes and searched my lover's face ter these, to me, words of doom. It was as flexible as marble, not a gleam of love, kind-ss or forgiveness. He was like a stern judge nouncing sentence upon me, and the thought irst like lightning upon me, searing my very ul.
"I had lost him forever! and throwing out my ands toward him, I sank with a low moan of ony at his feet before he could even put forth n arm to save me."

CHAPTER IV.

THE LEGACY OF JEWELS.

'In falling, my head struck against the base of pillar, cutting a severe gash in my forehead, hich, with the blow, nearly cost me my life—
here is the scar now, dear."
The old lady lifted the silvery hair from her orehead, revealing a white seam about an inch n length.
Brownie reached over and pressed her red lips pon it. The act nearly unnerved Miss Mehetа-el again.
"I was taken to a room in the house," she ent on, "put to bed, and a physician sent for, ut it was hours before I recovered conscious-ess, and the doctor said I had had a marvelous scape.
"I lay for days listening, trying to catch the cho of Roy's footsteps, and once or twice I fanied I heard it, and the deep, rich tones of his oice, asking some eager question. Then the ound would die away, and I thought my ears nd my longing heart had deceived me, for he ever came, and I was too proud and hurt to end for him.
"At last one day my maid brought me in a ittle note.
"I saw and recognized the handwriting as soon
s she opened the door.
"'Give it to me quick!' I cried, my heart ounding at the sight of it.
"With trembling fingers I tore it open and read
hese cold, formal words:

"'Will Miss Douglas kindly favor me with an nterview, if she is strong enough to endure it?
nd oblige, ROYAL DUNFORTH.'

"I nearly shrieked at the icy words—my nerves were still unstrung, and they hurt me as nothing else had ever done before.
"Was he coming to blame me—to charge me with the disgrace I had brought upon him and myself, and then cast me off forever? Had I sinned past all forgiveness? I asked myself again and again.
"I seized a pencil and wrote:

"'Yes, come at once, if you can forgive your repentant META.'

"I folded and inclosed it in an envelope, without sealing it, and giving it to a maid, told her to carry it down to Lord Dunforth, who, she said, was awaiting an answer.
"I did wrong to send him a written reply. I ought to have gone to him, even if I had been obliged to crawl upon my hands and knees to do so; but I was weak—I had not yet left my room, was able only to sit up for an hour or two at a time, and I thought, of course, he could come to me. I never dreamed of treachery."
"Treachery, auntie!" exclaimed Brownie, who was intensely interested in the sad tale.
"Ah, treachery, child, as you will soon see, and I might have known it, too, had my wits been about me.
"The maid came back almost immediately.
"I looked up in surprise as she entered.
"'Why are you back so soon?' I demanded.
"'I met Miss Helen on the stairs,' she answered, 'and she told me Lord Dunforth was in the drawing-room, and she would take the note in to him.'
"I could not say anything, but I did not like it even then; I did not like Helen Capel to be the bearer of any message from me to my lover. I liked her far less since the ball than I had ever done before, for I believed she had tried to make all this trouble for me. I had refused to see her during my sickness, although she had called a number of times and had also sent me beautiful flowers.
"I lay two hours, listening for my loved one's tread on the stairs. I had not a doubt but that he would obey my message and come to me. But at last I heard gay voices in the hall, then his deep, rich tones gravely saying 'good morning' to someone, after which came the sound of closing doors, and I knew he was gone.
"With a heart like lead, I bade the maid go down and ask Miss Capel if she had given Lord Dunforth my message.
"She came back, saying that Miss Capel said, 'Certainly, she had given his lordship the message.'
"Then it came to me that I had made a condition in my note—I had said if he could forgive me, to come to me.
"He could not forgive me, therefore he would not come, and, without even a word of farewell, he had left me forever.
"I cannot tell all that I suffered, Brownie. I know I raved against the injustice of Heaven in permitting such sorrow to come upon me, and in shutting out the light of my life from me. I cursed Helen Capel, her brother and the Count de Lussan for their part in the drama; but most of all, I cursed myself for having allowed myself to become their dupe.
"I insisted at once upon returning to my own home, where I was again prostrated, and for another long month lay sick and weak, and praying to die; and thus my wedding day passed. Oh, who can tell the blackness of despair which came over me as that day came and went. I was to have been a happy wife, proud and blessed in the love of a noble man. Instead, I was a heart-broken girl, wailing out my life in loneliness. A homeless beggar in the street was not more wretched than I.
"Another month went by, and I was at length thought able to ride out; and one day my father took me out to Richmond Park, where we spent an hour or two driving about.
"On our return, when about two miles from the city, I saw Lord Dunforth's elegant carriage, with its span of black horses, approaching. He was driving himself, and a lady whom I did not know sat by his side.
"With my brain on fire, and my heart quivering with pain, I sat like a statue, watching his every movement, noting his every expression.
"He gave a sudden start, which I could see shook his whole frame, while an expression of pain passed over his features. His face grew pale as my own, and he leaned forward with an eager look in his eyes, as if about to speak. Oh, if I had only smiled, if I had but spoken one word, all would have been well even then; but I did not, and drawing himself erect again, he inclined his head with haughty grace, and was gone.
"Many times I longed to write him a line, begging him to come to me, if only for an hour, that I might hear him say he forgave me; many times I had the pen in my hand to do so, but pride whispered, 'you are sick and feeble, it is his place to come to you, not yours to beg his presence,' and so we, who today might have been united and loving, were parted forever.
"My parents decided soon after to take me abroad, as the physician said my health would never improve unless I had some change, and we set sail for the United States early in May.
"In July, after our arrival here, they both sickened and died very suddenly, and I was left alone a stranger in a strange country.
"I could not return to England, where I had suffered and lost so much, and I could not remain here alone. Accordingly, I wrote my brother, begging him to take his family and come to me. I had often heard him say he would like to live in America. I commissioned him to settle the estate, as far as I was concerned, to the best of his ability, and bring me the proceeds when he came.
"To my great comfort he consented to my request and in October arrived in New York with his wife and child—their son, who was your father, Brownie.
"We decided to make our home in this city, having spent some time in traveling, and finding no other place we liked so well; and here they lived until God called them, and here I have lived ever since.
"Five years after our arrival we heard that Lord Dunforth had married Helen Capel's cousin, Lady Leonie Herford, and just three months later I learned that but for Miss Capel's treachery I might have been his wife."
"Oh, auntie! only just three months after his marriage!" exclaimed Brownie in deep distress.
"Yes, dear, those three months were all that stood between me and my future happiness; but what matters it if it had been but a day, or an hour even, if it were that much too late?
"I found out that Miss Capel never gave that note of mine to Lord Dunforth, but told him instead that I utterly refused to see him then and ever after.
"When he met me driving afterward, and I did not even recognize him, but sat so cold and indifferent, he was confirmed in the truth of her statement. I was told that it was a terrible blow to him, for he loved me and would have made me his wife notwithstanding all that had passed. He left England almost immediately after we sailed for America, and did not return until a year before his marriage."
"Who told you all this, auntie?"
"A friend of his lordship told my brother, who met him while he was traveling in this country. He did not know the truth of the matter regarding the note I sent, until brother told him, and I do not suppose Lord Dunforth knows to this day of Helen Capel's treachery or that she was the cause of our separation.
"Now, darling," concluded Miss Mehetabel, with a little tremulous smile which was sadder than tears, "you know the reason why I am an old maid."
"Did Miss Capel ever marry?" Brownie asked.
"Yes, the year following Lord Dunforth's marriage; but I have forgotten the name of her husband."
"If you had discovered her treachery before his marriage would you have sought a reconciliation?"

Where Was I To Get the Money

—and then Emma Broach told me about her "Magic Purse Filler"—an ideal way to earn extra money each week without having to step out of the house.

HOW we were going to manage was worrying me almost sick—
I hadn't had anything new for so long that I was getting ashamed to go anywhere. And I wanted things for the house—new curtains and a long list of other items.
Everet's teeth needed attention. So did mine. And there were some bills six months overdue.
But where was the money to come from?
We were paying for a home. That and the butcher's and grocer's bills and other necessary expenses took every cent almost as fast as Everet could earn it. No matter how we skimped and squeezed and went without, there was never anything left over.

Mrs. Helene Himberg 261 Wyckoff Street Brooklyn, N. Y.

I Couldn't Neglect My Home

"If I could earn some extra money!" I kept thinking. But it seemed like wishing for the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.
Nearly every day I had my work all done by one or two o'clock or a little after. Often I was all through by ten or eleven in the morning. It seemed a shame to let all that spare time go to waste when I needed money so badly.
But what could I do?
I couldn't neglect the meals or the housework—so a place in a store or office or any other work requiring regular hours was out of the question. Except for plain mending, I couldn't sew. I knew I was not cut out for canvassing or selling—and besides I was too sensitive about what the neighbors would say to try anything so public. Rack my brains as I would, there seemed nothing else left.

Emma Had A Lot Of New Things

One afternoon last spring when I was feeling blue and discouraged, Emma Broach came over. We had been friends since our school days. But we now lived so far apart that it was often a long time between visits.
Of course I was glad to see her. But I must confess that in a way she made me feel more blue and discouraged than ever. From head to heels every thing she had on was new—she looked as if she had just stepped out of a fashion plate. I couldn't help envying her.
When she mentioned a little trip she had taken the week before, and some new furniture she had just ordered for her living-room, my envy doubled. I knew her husband didn't make any more than Everet. I wondered how she did it. Finally I blurted right out and asked her.

I Was All Ears

"Really, Helene," she answered, "I have bought so many things in the last few months that I know people must think some rich relative has left us all his money. But it's even better than that. I call it my 'Magic Purse Filler'."
"Helene," she went on, "I've found the ideal way to earn money at home—in spare time. It's so easy and interesting that it doesn't seem like work at all."
I was all ears—maybe Emma's "Magic Purse Filler" would solve my troubles too.
"You know how popular wool hose have become," she continued, "Even in summer—for golf, tennis and other sports. And in winter everybody wants them. That's the secret of all my new things—I earn them by knitting hose.
"Oh, no!" Emma explained, in answer to my question. "Not by hand. I knit them on a wonderful little hand knitting machine—my 'Magic Purse Filler.' I can knit a pair in so short a time. And I get fine pay for every pair I make."

Emma Tells The Way

"But who pays you?" I asked. "And how did you get started?"
"There is a concern in Rochester, New York," Emma answered, "that wants all the home-knit hose it can get—to supply to stores. You know how nearly everybody thinks genuine home-knit goods are so much better than the factory kind. It's the Home Profit Hosiery Company. You get the knitter from them They show you how to use it—how to knit hose, sweaters and many other articles. They also furnish free yarn—it doesn't cost you a penny. You do the knitting entirely at your own convenience—sit down at the machine just whenever you feel like it. Then, as fast as you finish a dozen or more pairs, you send them to the Home Profit Hosiery Company and they send you a check. It's the easiest way to earn extra money I have ever heard of."
If Emma could do it, why couldn't I? She had a booklet with her that told all about the plan. I eagerly read every word of it and then immediately sent for a machine.
With the machine came a book of instructions that made everything simple and clear. After a little practice—simply following directions carefully—I quickly got the knack of it and have been doing fine ever since.

My First Check

The first week—just sitting down at the machine whenever I had nothing else to do—I knit four dozen pairs. A few days later I received my first check—and how happy and proud I was. Since then the postman has brought me dozens of such checks—Many of them for much larger amounts; but none has ever given me such a thrill as that first one did—for it meant that at last I had found the way to keep my pocket book filled instead of empty—a way to end all the old skimping and worrying and doing without.
Operating the Home Profit Knitter looked so easy that Everet—who at first sort of pooh-poohed the whole idea—got interested and tried his hand. Now many an evening he fills his pipe and sits down at the Knitter and knits two or three or a half dozen pairs of hose before going to bed—says he would rather do it than read.

I No Longer Have to Do Without

Before long I had all the back bills paid up and enough money to blossom out in new clothes. Also for the first time in my life I now have a little money in the bank—all my own. And the amount is steadily growing larger each month.
It's really surprising what a difference a little extra money can make. More than once I have earned enough in a single week to pay for a nice new dress. The biggest check I ever received in all my life came one week when Everet helped me every evening. Everet said last night maybe we would be better off if he were to quit his job as a painter and give all his time to knitting hose— and at that perhaps there's more truth in his remark than he realized.

Convulsions of Babies

WRITERS make different classifications of convulsions according to their own peculiar notions in regard to the nature and causes of the disorder. In our talk this month we shall consider but two kinds, sympathetic and symptomatic. The symptomatic convulsions are signs or symptoms of a condition where the disease has invaded the brain, as in meningitis, typhoid fever and tubercular disease. This form of convulsion we shall not discuss at this time, as it is simply a complication of some organic disease from which the baby is suffering.

Convulsions of the sympathetic class are the ones that seem to be of the most practical importance for consideration in this column, as they are the kind that occur most often, and in babies who appear to be well and strong, causing the mother serious alarm.

It has been generally stated that weak, delicate, nervous babies are more liable to have convulsions; but this is not true, though a baby with an irritable, nervous temperament is very susceptible, and you often get this kind of temperament in a strong, healthy baby. The causes of sympathetic convulsions are teething, indigestion, or any disturbance of the digestion, or stomach. In some babies even a slight rise in temperature from any cause will bring on a convulsion. A sudden pain, head exposed to hot sun or sudden exposure to cold will bring one on. In some cases the only cause that could be detected was constipation with impaction of lower bowel.

The signs or symptoms that a mother will notice before a convulsion comes on vary and are uncertain, but in most cases you will detect a disordered condition of the nervous system, the baby sleeps lightly, is easily disturbed, baby moans or starts or may have frightful dreams, screams out, or awakens in a bewildered, frightened manner. The baby seems very irritable, crying or fretting without cause. The expression is peculiar, a fixed staring look, lasting only a moment as if the baby was looking intently at some object, while in fact it is gazing at vacancy, the expression is without meaning.

Some babies seem to be pleased or happy and a smile passes over the face just previous to an attack. You often get tremblings or tremors in some cases, whether baby is asleep or awake. There may be a closing of the fingers and thumbs.

With or without any of the preliminary signs mentioned the convulsion begins suddenly. The baby utters a cry, becomes unconscious, the muscles of arms and legs draw up, the eyes are for a moment fixed and staring, then drawn upward until you can see only the white portion of the balls of the eyes. The whole body becomes rigid and stiff, and you may not be able to detect that baby is breathing. The face for a moment may be pale, but becomes red and congested and the veins of the neck become noticeable.

The state of spasm is followed quickly by irregular convulsive movements. The face is not always congested, but may become pale or even bluish. In severe cases the baby may not be able to swallow. As the attack begins to subside, the convulsive movements become more and more feeble until they cease entirely and the baby falls into a deep sleep, or more or less of a stupor. The duration of an attack is variable and in very severe cases may continue several hours, but as a general rule lasts from a few minutes to half an hour. When the attacks recur several times a day they leave the patient more or less conscious, but there may be restlessness and delirium. The period of time, during which the recurrence continues depends principally upon the cause of the convulsion. The danger of a convulsion depends entirely on the severity of the attack and the cause. If the attack is slight and followed soon by complete restoration of consciousness, there is not much doubt but what the condition is sympathetic; but if the baby is sick before the convulsion, it may indicate the presence of some brain involvement, and be a serious complication.

The important thing to bear in mind is that baby will not have a convulsion unless something is radically wrong. The cause of the trouble must be discovered and removed.

There are some general rules to be followed that every mother should know. The first thing to do is to remove the clothing, or at least loosen enough to relieve any constriction of the breathing. The air in the room should be good, and if the room is hot or poorly ventilated, expose the child to the fresh air of an open window. In some cases by simply doing this baby will come out of the convulsion, especially if the air in the room had been foul or full of smoke.

It is a general rule always to place the baby in a warm bath 96 or 97 degrees F.—no matter what the cause of the convulsion may be. This has proved to be an efficient remedy and easily procured. Be careful not to get the water too hot and if a thermometer is not available, dip your elbow into the water and test it.

The warm bath was never known to do harm unless too hot, and the baby burned. The baby should be left in the warm bath 10 or 20 minutes or until all the convulsive movements have ceased.

Remove baby from bath and wrap in flannel or blanket. Do not put on clothes for a while, as you may wish to put it in again, and whether you do or not it is best to hold baby for a while until it gets over the shock of an attack.

You can now consider the cause, and if there is any suspicion of indigestion or constipation, relieve this by moving the bowels at once with suppositories or an enema. Castor oil, or one-half grain doses of calomel are good treatment.

If the stomach seems distended, it will be proper treatment to produce vomiting.

If the baby is teething, the gums swollen, they should be freely lanced under antiseptic precautions. In cases where there is no indigestion, no teething, but the baby's head seems hot and a convulsion occurs, put baby in warm bath, apply cold cloths to head and send for a physician to find out, if possible, the cause in this special case.

The subject of our talk next month will be, Scarlet Fever.

Questions and Answers

STIES.—What can I do for my three-year-old boy, who for over a year has had sties on his eyes, although his eyes do not seem to be weak?

MRS. J. M. C., Albermarle, N. C.

A.—Hot fomentations, and frequent washings with saturated Boracic acid solution when pus seems to have formed, but if you will bathe eyes with one-tenth of one per cent. Chlorazene solution (Dakins Solution), you will prevent pus forming. A succession of sties means that the general system should be built up, and I suggest that you give your boy three-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron in syrup, after meals, three times a day.

SORE NAVEL.—What can I do for my two-year-old boy, who has reddish spots near navel that look like blisters? They heal up, itch, then become raw again.

MRS. C. C., Elkins, W. Va.

A.—I should bathe the parts once a day with Dakins solution, then apply a little sulphur ointment. Keep bowels regular and give two-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron in syrup, three times a day, after meals.

BED-WETTING.—What can I do for my 10-year-old girl who wets the bed every night? She seems normal in every way, and I have tried everything, even coaxing and spanking. MRS. J. C., Manchester, Tenn.

A.—Bed-wetting is a most obstinate condition to relieve, and we must first find the cause and remove it. Spanking is absolutely wrong as the child is not responsible. Many of the most obstinate cases will yield to treatment when the urine is made clear and mild by some simple alkalies, like cream of tartar, teaspoonful to glass of water, or equal parts of vichy water and milk.

If urine is concentrated, with odor of ammonia, give three-grain doses of Urotropin in one-half glass of water, three times a day. Do not do this if urine is acid, as this will acidify it.

Have urine examined to see if acid.

In some cases you get bed-wetting from reflex irritation of the bladder walls from pinworms. Enlarged, diseased tonsils, and adenoids will often cause this condition; in such case a surgical operation is required to remove the cause of the nervous condition and give relief.

UNDER WEIGHT.—My two-year-old girl is under weight, although she seems healthy. She walked when she was seven and one-half months old, and has all her teeth but her eye-teeth. Her diet is milk, beans, potatoes, meat, corn and fruits. What can I do for myself as I am all run down? "JUST A MOTHER."

A.—Get your baby out of doors all you can, and give her plenty of milk and cream. Give meat and potato in moderation, but do not think I should give her beans, or corn. For yourself, get a bottle of Elix. Iron, Quinine and Strychnine, and take teaspoonful doses in water, after each meal, three times a day.

BABY SITTING UP.—Will it injure my three-months-old baby to sit up in a chair? How old should a baby be to use a baby walker?

MRS. J. L. B., Moorefield, Ky.

A.—Your baby is too young to sit up. Should not encourage baby to walk by any means until after the eighth month. Sitting up, or walking too young, are the causes of weak backs and legs.

INFANT'S CLOTHES.—What should an infant's clothes consist of that is born in May?

MRS. V. L., Forney, Texas.

A.—You should have woolen receiving blanket, three small abdominal bands, three shirts, woolen, pinning blanket, three outing flannel nightdresses, three dozen diapers, four cotton slips or dresses. Of course there is no limit to baby's wardrobe that you can get, but you really need the things mentioned.

CONVULSIONS.—My four-months-old baby has spells about every three weeks. She wakes up crying, screaming, eyes get large and she seems wild. The attacks last fifteen minutes and during this time it is impossible to awaken her at all. MRS. S., Hoxbar, Okla.

A.—From your letter would suspect that your baby has some form of convulsions. Coming in such regularity, would indicate a persistent cause, and I should advise a careful examination by a physician.

HEMORRHOIDS.—What can I do for my three-year-old boy who has piles that protrude at each movement? He is fond of cereals, milk, custards, but will not eat cooked fruits. MRS. T. E. C., Macon, Ga.

A.—It is exceptional for a child of this age to have hemorrhoids, but without doubt the condition was caused by constipation. Give him enough American oil or Nujol each day to produce one or two soft, easy bowel movements. After each movement, insert in the rectum an Iodex suppository; your druggist can get these from Menley and James, New York City.

NURSING BABY.—Should baby ever be allowed to nurse at night; if so, how often, and how old should it be when you feed them during day only?

MRS. C., Tennessee.

The following is practical for an average baby, small baby will require less, a large one more.

Third to seventh day, ten feedings, two hours apart, one to one and one-half ounces at a feeding, two night feedings.

Second and third week, ten feedings, two hours apart, two night feedings, two to three ounces at a feeding.

Fourth and fifth week, nine feedings, two hours apart, one night feeding, two to three ounces at a feeding.

Third to sixth month seven feedings three hours apart four to five ounces at a time, no night feedings.

HERNIA.—My fourteen-months-old baby boy does not walk or creep, will not hold his weight on his feet. He is ruptured on both sides, and his stomach is very large. His bowels are too active and do not respond to treatment. MRS. R. H., Athens, Tenn.

A.—Would advise your taking your baby to some hospital and have the ruptures relieved, as this will correct the intestinal trouble, and as soon as he gets his strength he will walk.

DIARRHEA.—My baby is twenty months old and has always had trouble with his bowels moving too often; cooked or uncooked fruit or vegetables pass through in a few hours; bowels sometimes move eight times a day.

MRS. C. A. W., Philadelphia, Miss.

A.—Give baby two-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron, in syrup, three times a day. Give him a tablet, containing Bismuth Subnitrate, three grains, Pepsin Sacch, two grains, Aromatic powder, one grain, every three or six hours, depending on the frequency of the movements.

His diet should consist of milk, stale wheat bread, oatmeal, cooked a long time, cream of wheat, custards, a little baked potato.

Give "California Fig Syrup" Child's Harmless Laxative

Mother! This gentle laxative cleanses the child's system thoroughly. It never gripes or overacts like harsh cathartics, calomel, or castor oil. Children love it.

Avoid imitations! Ask druggist for genuine "California Fig Syrup" which has directions for babies and children of all ages printed on bottle. Say "California" anything will do, but I prefer the bath towel doggie, with spots painted on with shoe polish or other coloring, eyes worked with thread or made with beads or shoe buttons.

I also made little fudge aprons from two yards of eighteen-inch crash. Fold in the center lengthwise, begin about the center of the two yards and cut front part of neck in desired shape then gradually taper shoulder straps until the extreme ends are two or three inches wide. The goods cut out of neck can be used for something else. Face neck, hem bottom and embroider or applique some pretty design on front and bottom. The straps go over shoulders, cross in back and are brought around in front and fasten points together with button or snap. When made of unbleached domestic they are very inexpensive and are pretty, too.

I would like to get letters from the sisters. . . try to answer all those who send stamps.

I drew a large map of the U. S. and am going to cut it out and use it for a pattern to piece a . . . using a different piece for each state. If any of the sisters care to send me a piece large enough for her . . . and address to add to my quilt I will appreciate it . . . be glad to have you for a neighbor.

With love and best regards to all,

MRS. CHAS. G. . . .

SAN ANTONIO, 2312 E. HOUSTON ST., Tex.

DEAR COMFORT FOLKS:

I am sending my baby's picture, taken December, 1921. He was four months old at that time and weighed fourteen pounds. His name is John Harris O'Larmic.

A sister wanted to know how to make flowers grow in winter. I buy narcissus and hyacinth bulbs in November and put them in a vase of water, . . . down, changing water daily, and they bloom by January or February, or earlier, depending upon the . . . This is called forcing and the bulbs will not bloom the following spring but will the spring after if they are put in dirt as soon as they finish blooming.

JOHN HARRIS O'LARMIC.

Do the sisters make rug towels from worn-out . . . I do, using some good part of cast-off gingham . . . for applique cups and saucers. I also make . . . baby's bed from the best parts of old sheets. . . . for the kitchen can be made the same way.

I have been a reader of COMFORT since a child . . . mother was a subscriber then. I think it . . . magazine and specially like the patchwork and . . . work page.

How many of the sisters have visited San Antonio? It is a prosperous town of 161,000 population with . . . eral attractive parks. Brackenridge, the most interesting one, has a big zoo containing monkeys, . . . bear, bison, deer, moose, sacred buffalo, sea lions, . . . trichs and bob cats. There are three depots, . . . large hotels, the Alamo and many other places of . . . terest.

I would like to exchange postals with any of the sisters. I wish scenery cards from different states.

I see no reason for withholding name and address, so you may publish mine.

MRS. JOHN O'LAR. . .

It's no use for the joy killers to tell little John O'Larmic "there ain't no Santa Claus. . . . wouldn't believe it and why should he? . . . he tangible proof that there is, in the shape of . . . his new sweater, cap and leggings, that were . . . brought only the day before? Of course he believes in Santa Claus. Merry Christmas, . . . and may your smile never grow less.—Ed.

MAXWELL, N. Mex.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

May I come in with a few Christmas suggestions? . . . Nearly everyone has some cast-off clothes that . . . make over into good caps and coats for some little . . . Maybe an old fur set or a plush coat that could be . . . as a scarf and muff. I have three girls, six, four and . . . three years old, so I know from experience what . . . be done.

Try making the Cubby Bear stories into books, . . . then give them a box of crayons and see how many . . . hours of enjoyment they will get out of such a box.

Anyone handy with saw and hammer can make all . . . kinds of things from boxes obtained at the grocery . . . store, a chair, doll bed or table and lots of other . . . can be made with very little labor.

Home-made candy is very acceptable to anyone . . . or old, and I give lots of it, especially to the . . . folks for it is harder to make things for them. . . . sending some of my favorite candy recipes and maybe . . . you will see them in print.

Flower or garden seeds and bulbs are very nice . . . ents if done up into a Christmas package. These . . . are jellies, and home-made cakes and cookies that . . . be sent to the bachelor girl or girl and boy at . . .

I have a baby boy one year old and he keeps . . . busy, although the girls take lots of care of him.

I would like to hear from the sisters on the care of . . . children and will answer all that enclose stamps.

Just one more thing and then I'll go. Sisters, . . . do you withold your names unless your letter is of . . . personal nature, especially when you request it? . . . Did you ever stop to think of the work it makes . . . Mrs. Wilkinson? I believe she is frowning at me. . . . Good by, I'll come again.

MRS. LLOYD MILLER.

MRS. MILLER.—I wasn't frowning, I was trying . . . to give you an encouraging nod which, translated, . . . would mean, "That's right, you tell them, they . . . get cross if I say anything."—Ed.

KOSSUTH, Miss.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Here's my hand for a hearty shake and if I could be . . . a fairy for a short while I would peep in at the door . . . of every COMFORT sister and especially every flower . . . lover's home. I have been deluged with letters from . . . every part of our great U. S. A. since telling you about . . . my flowers. So many failed to enclose stamp for reply . . . that I will have to ask our Mrs. Wilkinson to keep . . . give you all the information you desired. I answered . . . all that did enclose postage and many that did not.

her eyes. Do what she would, she could not h that haunting ghost of Lesard. Each word ad said to her rose up and battered at her , that it might not be forgotten. And as if wn wrongs were not enough, there was Gil- turning to a pale shadow of herself before very eyes.

r it would be no easy thing for the men who robbed Wellford House to get clear, and an knew it. There was not a newspaper r in England who did not know to a stone what they had taken, from the duchess' of pearls and diamonds and priceless neck- and rubies, to poor little Mrs. Fareham's wed brooches and bracelets. Even the men, made their living by buying stolen jewels d be afraid to take these at the price of a ound note for the lot. Most of them were rated family jewels, about as easy to dis- of as the Kohinoor.

d there was no safety in the foreign market, Amsterdam, Paris and New York were just as dangerous as London. Whoever had the der would have to wait a long time before sing of it, and walk very softly in the mean-d of all places in England, Hamilton Place ed the quietest, the farthest removed from hing out of the common.

ere had been no midnight reunions of Mr. hmont and his upper servants; no visitors ark or daylight that were not people well vn in the neighborhood; furthermore, Jacky satisfied herself that there was not a game- er to be found on the whole estate, with the ption of a doddering old man, with a stupid, fed grandson as his only helper. These two h-built men in velveteen that night had cer- ly been flesh and blood, but they were quite ertainly no servants of Marchmont's.

or did she think they could be farmers, for ks to those recommendations, Gillian was no er in a kind of State prison where walks were idden. With her red-haired maid in charge, might roam where she would within the ts of the huge estate. And the two had, y thought, scoured every inch of it and found spot where two confederates could possibly l.

it had not been for the newspapers, full of tling paragraphs about supposed discoveries he missing jewels—paragraphs that were con- icted next day—and for the damning fact she had never heard one word from Lesard, y could have thought the whole thing a m.

ut not Gillian! She devoured every news- r she could lay her hands on, believed every t she read till it was denied, and shook with ut all day long for the man she loved still.

r. Marchmont had offered a reward for the ing pearl collar as his neighbors had done their more valuable things. Gillian saw the c every Sunday, stuck up in the village where drove to church with her guardian. Mr. March- t was never absent from morning service, any e than Miss Hamilton's maid was ever seen he servants' pew. But she saw the notice one as she was on an errand for the housekeeper, the insolence of it made her furious. Quiet hings looked, she was absolutely certain that only did Mr. Marchmont know exactly where collar was, but that it and everything else had been stolen was safely stored in his se. Something else, too, brought her impa- ce to a head. Gillian had heard from the ful Sir Simon Wellford that proceedings to ver the value of the borrowed diamonds had begun against Mrs. Fareham by the Jew stock- er, and "borrowed" was not the ugliest word l in connection with the matter. If they were found soon there would be little reputation for the pretty young widow who had no erful family to back her up.

"It's all very well to wait till they're off their rd," Jacky thought, as she repaired to Mrs. bs with the toothache-drops for which she had n sent to the village, "but goodness knows re those diamonds will be by that time, and wants them now!"

Come in!" cried the housekeeper joyfully, or much so as a raging tooth would permit. She a vast respect for the red-haired girl ever e she had returned from Wellford House, ab- tely silent about the robbery. Mrs. Gibbs was accustomed to such behavior from any one h such recommendations, and had quite given the idea that Mary James knew nothing.

Have you got the drops? Thank goodness, for ween pain and Marchmont fussing round, I'm rly wild."

What's the matter with him?" shortly. It s odd to live in her grandmother's house a rant, and knowing nothing about its master ept what filtered through the housekeeper.

Oh, they've sent a man down from the London ective force, and he's ferreting about every- re! He was here all the morning, asking ut those pearls, and Marchmont isn't one to worried about a few two-penny pearls. Be- s——"

Jacky laughed, standing with one small foot the fender. It was all very well to be as far ve suspicion as Cæsar's wife, or Mr. March- t, of Hamilton Place, but it might nevertheless be as uncomfortable to have fifty thousand nds worth of stolen jewels in your possession.

It's all very well for you to laugh!" Mrs. bs remarked crossly, through the large silk dkerchief that adorned her head. "You haven't to put up with his tantrums. I can tell you can be a Tartar!"

A devil incarnate," someone else had called t! Jacky winced at the thought.

As for me," pursued Mrs. Gibbs, "I'm not go- to catch my death of cold creeping around house after dark, but he was that vicious I en't say so. I wonder if you wouldn't go down ight after the house is quiet and open that r under your window! Could you, like a good l?" She had thrown caution to the winds ce she had decided that the new maid knew rything.

Where's the butler?" cautiously. As for the o footmen, she had long ago discovered that y were merely ordinary servants, like the maids.

Gone on an errand," significantly. "He was the ly one to send. You'll leave the door open for n; there's no latch-keys in this rattletrap stle. I don't fancy it myself. Give me a good vn house, with a door into the next one, and I told Marchmont! But, no! This was drunken m Hamilton's scheme, and Marchmont fan- d it."

Tom Hamilton! His daughter stood aghast.

Why," she said lamely, "he was Miss Hamil- n's father!"

But the housekeeper was taken up with an ex- t twinge; she did not see the surprise in the ie eyes that did not match the red hair. That m Hamilton had been a disreputable vagabond one knew better than his daughters, but not en Gillian had dreamed of this. Gillian, who d found in his old writing-desk those magical ferences that had worked for Jacky like a Free- ason's grip in a foreign country.

"Of course, and I can't see how she comes to such a fool! He had good wits when he sn't drunk. It was him worked out this scheme, trusting no one who didn't have references. hy, even the butler had to take his with him day, that they might know he was sent. I con- ss I was staggered when I saw yours! I ex- cted just an ordinary girl, but I suppose Billy ought it was safer, you hung about so much ith Miss Hamilton. And it's lucky for me to- ght, because you can let them in!"

The maid could only nod.

Who was Billy? And what was this dreadful ws about her father, whose blood ran in her ins? Had he been a thief and in league with ieves, and was there no truth nor honor any- here?

She dared not think, standing before Mrs. Gibbs, whom even toothache might not blind to the look on her face.

"It's safer, much!" she returned with com- posure. "You can trust me to see to the door," but as she turned away her heart beat madly.

For all she knew, this very night her enemies might give themselves into her hands!

The flush of elation that was hot under the white enamel on Jacky's face ebbed even as she closed the door of the housekeeper's room behind her.

At first, in spite of that revelation about "Tom Hamilton's scheme," her heart had been almost gay—that at last she could see her way to carry- ing out that plan that was her one thought, night and day. But now a quick conviction of coming dangers slowed her pulse.

It seemed a simple thing to creep down-stairs and unbolt a door—but why did not Marchmont do it himself? Could Mrs. Gibbs' apparent open- ness be all a trap, her careless statement about Tom Hamilton merely a veiled warning that the meshes about Gillian were thicker than could ever be broken? For, if this were true, there must be many pages in her father's life that would not bear the light of day! Supposing the hiding place of those jewels was discovered by that de- tective from London. The red-haired maid knew enough now of Mr. Marchmont to be sure that at the last pinch it would not be he who would bear the brunt, but Gillian, the daughter of a dead thief and blackguard.

To the white-faced girl moving slowly through the house to Gillian's room the hushed, decorous air of it seemed to smell of danger. The very tapestry on the walls seemed to sway with the moving of unseen spies behind it, mocking at the girl who passed them thinking to defeat with her own power the schemes of some of the subtlest men in England.

She had meant to tell Gillian all she had heard, but now she hesitated at her sister's door.

The story of the references she would tell, if only to warn Gillian how she must not dream of anything but flying for her life if anything should happen to "Mary James."

"What could they do to me, supposing they found me out? They dare not murder me," but though she thought bravely enough, she was not so sure.

"They," Mrs. Gibbs had said. Who could "they" be but Lesard and the bullet-headed man?

And surely Lesard—liar, thief, deceiver of wo- men, though she knew him to be—could not stand by and see murder done to the girl he had loved enough to warn against his own confederate?

Yet, after all, what did she know of Lesard?

He had made her acquaintance in the street by restoring to her a purse she had dropped. It had held all the money she owned; she had thanked him with sparkling eyes. Now she wondered if he had picked her pocket in order to scrape ac- quaintance!

In all their short friendship she had never known anything at all about him, except that he had offices in Capel Court in London; that he seemed to have money; was always perfectly dressed, and that his name was Lesard. She gave a little frightened gasp as it came over her suddenly that she did not even know his Chris- tian name.

"Gill knows; he's her husband!" she said to herself sharply, to drive out the memory of those heaven-sweet days when the sun had risen and set for the man who was her lover. She opened the door of Gillian's room, and the sight of her sister's wax face quickened the hatred of the man who had betrayed them both.

"What are you going to do with that frock?" she said, with surprise, for Gillian was trying on a pale yellow evening dress her sister had never seen.

"It came from London while you were out. He says I'm to wear it tonight; he has a dinner- party."

"Gillian turned from the glass, her face very white and pitiful over the gorgeous satin gown. "You don't think it's a—a purple velvet! Jacky, do you?"

Jacky pointed to the dressmaker's name on the cardboard dress-box.

"Not any more than you are a Mrs. Gibbs," she returned almost absently. "Who's coming to din- ner, Gill?"

"I don't know. Only men, I think, but he said I must come down."

"A dinner-party! So that was why he could not open the side door himself. It was bold, too, to have people to dine on the very night those men were to come; bold, and in its way clever. But even Jacky did not guess just how bold it was.

She threw down her hat and coat. She had long ceased to be cautious in Gillian's room, for no one ever came there except a housemaid at stated times. Yet she was all caution in an- other way as she stretched herself in an easy- chair by the fire. There was that in Gillian's face which told her that to say Lesard was com- ing to the house that very night would mean ruin. She would insist on seeing him from some hiding place, and once she saw him Jacky knew there would be no holding her. She would run to him, betray everything, be as wax in those strong, unscrupulous fingers. And then farewell to those jewels, forevermore!

"Gill, I've heard something today," she said abruptly. "No, don't look like that! It's about father. Mrs. Gibbs let out about those recom- mendations. She says those, and coming to this house, and everything—were father's scheme. Ex- cept that he died before he could come himself, and so Mr. Marchmont adopted you to get the entree in the neighborhood."

Gillian closed her eyes with a shiver, but there was no surprise on her face.

"I had found that out for myself," she said. "Look here, what I found among his papers this afternoon. I didn't understand it quite, but I do now." She held out a sheet of paper, and Jacky, with a sick heart, read a list of all the great houses for twenty miles round.

"Why are there crosses after some of them?" she asked, staring at her father's writing.

"Those are all the very rich houses, the family jewel people's! Jacky, if Marchmont is ever caught, what will happen to me? He would not hold his tongue if he could make Tom Hamilton's daughter look guilty."

"He'll be a cleverer man than he is, if he does that," but there was no conviction in her voice.

"We must get away from this before that hap- pens, Gill," she rose and looked hard at her, "could you face Lesard if you had to, and—and hold your own?"

Gillian turned the color of ashes.

"No," she whispered. "I'd follow him to the end of the world. I'd do whatever he said; I shouldn't care if he were a murderer."

"Not if he murdered me?" All the bitterness of her heart was in her voice. "I suppose not! But listen. If anything happens to me, if I dis- appear, will you have sense enough to know that it is Lesard who has disposed of me? Will you promise me to run for your life from him for my sake?"

"You're mad—dreaming!" Gillian cried.

"I'm very sane," composedly. "I tell you if I am found out in this house that will be the end of me. I know it."

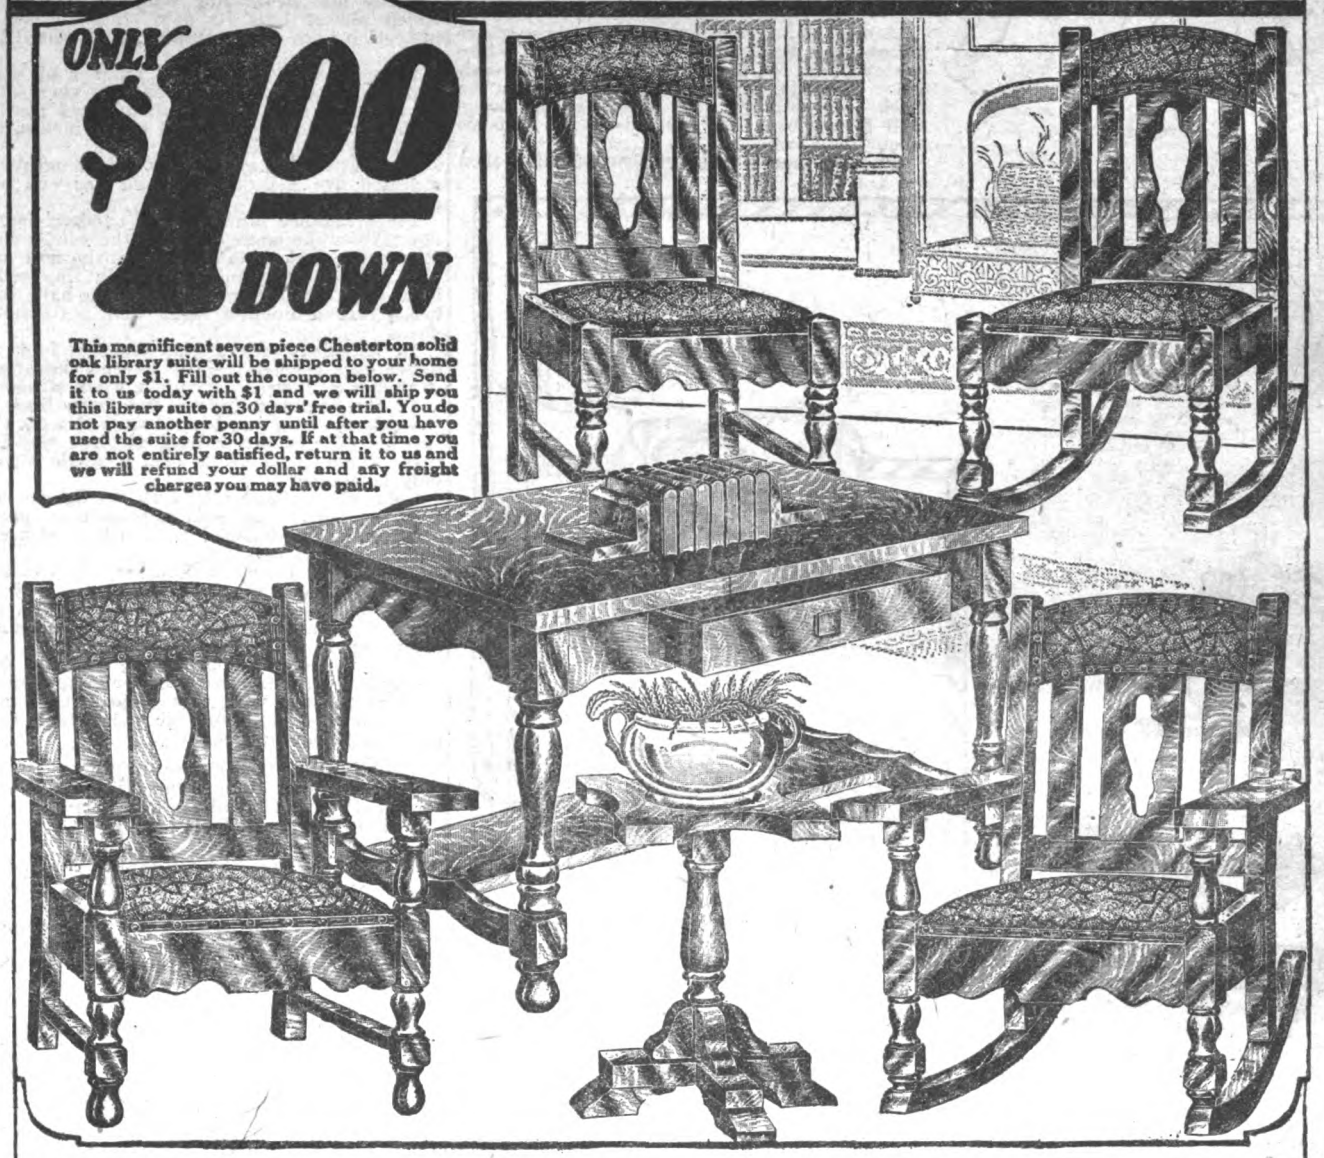
"Marchmont can't find you out; no one can," dully.

"No one but Lesard. You forget he knows me."

Gillian, still in her satin gown, flung her arms round her sister.

"Jacky, Jacky," she moaned, "teach me to hate him! I try and try, but I can't. If I were free perhaps I could, but I'm his wife."

"If I dared, you should be his widow!" but the hot thought was unspoken. Gillian, who could forgive anything, could never understand the passion in her sister's heart any more than that sister could comprehend her dreadful loyalty to Lesard. Jacky Hamilton had never in her life forgotten or forgiven a wrong.



"You'll be free yet, Gill," she said softly, though her lips were dry.

Gillian clung to her, comforted by words that would have made her shriek outright if she had understood them.

"Don't ring for me, if I'm not here when you come up tonight," the sham maid said abruptly,

Each piece in this suite is expertly built of thoroughly seasoned genuine solid oak, in the popular fumed oak finish. This finish is applied by an exclusive patented process which penetrates right into the wood. It is not just on the surface. The top panels and seats of the chairs and rockers are carefully upholstered and covered in Royal Artificial Spanish Brown Leather—extra heavy, tough, pliable and wear resisting. This is the heaviest grade of artificial leather on the market and will give years of splendid service. An exclusive period design of rare charm and distinctive beauty. Note its graceful symmetry and beautiful proportions. It has all the earmarks and general appearance of the highest priced furniture. For the wash-cloths, use a double thickness of ordinary white mosquito netting. In size, cut about 12 inches square.

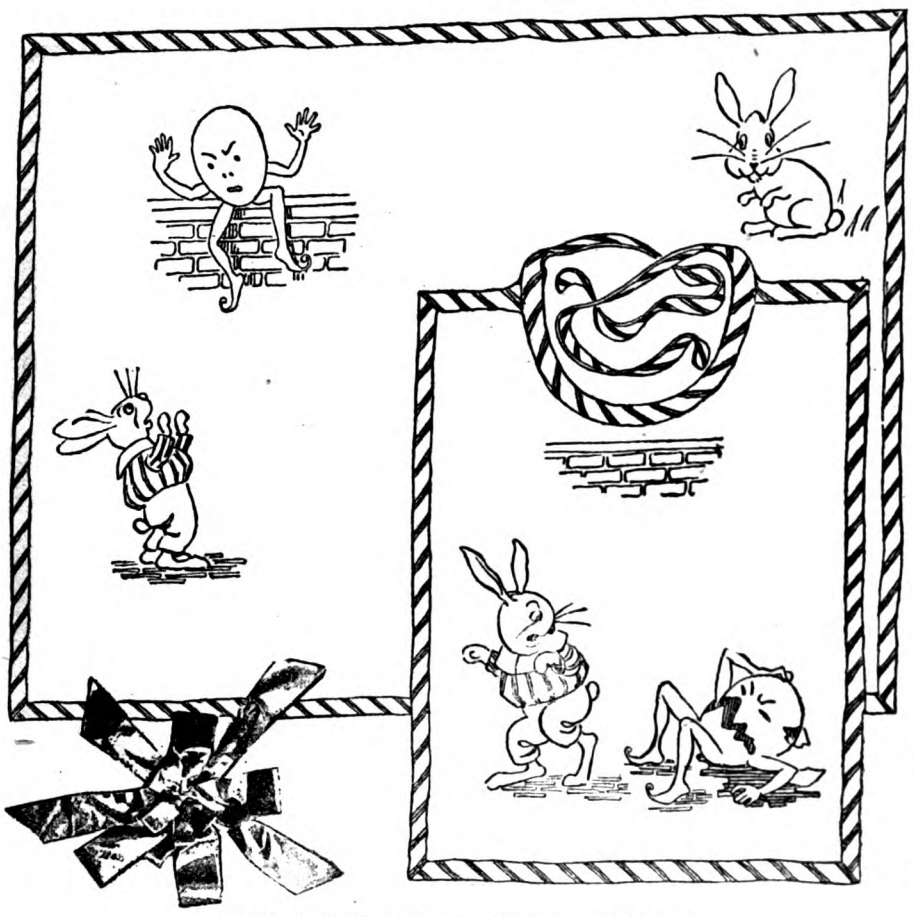
Crochet a close picot edge all around with the silakteen. These little cloths are soft as down after they are once wet.



Rosebud Pillow

A most dainty and attractive little carriage pillow may be made of baby blue and white cotton perle, No. 3. Make six squares of each color in single crochet, working through the back loop only of each stitch so the rows will form ribs. The squares should measure about four inches.

Put together in checker-board fashion then work on each square four tiny pink bullion-stitch rosebuds with green lazy-daisy stitch leaves.

A handsome ribbon bow for a carriage robe, a pair of embroidered cap strings, a flannel-covered, tiny hot water bottle bearing baby's name, or any other little gift, for that matter may be made doubly attractive if neatly boxed and accompanied with such a little card as this:

"If all the little babies were
As sweet as you,
I'd have to make so many gifts,
I don't know what I'd do."

CARRIAGE ROSETTE AND A BREAD-AND-MILK SET.

Cuddle Toys

FOR the "most dear" wee folks on your gift list there are many varieties of delightful, huggable little dolls and animals which can be made up very easily fo old stockings or small pieces of cotton outing flannel or gingham.

Of these we illustrate a funny black cuddle cat, Sonny Boy and Sarah Jane. Then there are endless bunnies, dogs, elephants, clowns, jolly Aunt Dinah and a host of others that the little folks are sure to love.

Sonny and Sarah are examples of the stamped doll patterns which come all ready to outline. When these are worked, the front and back are machine stitched together on the wrong side, turned and stuffed lightly with cotton batting.

The black cat which is just right to tuck under little Reddy's arm may be made up without any pattern as follows:

From an old black silk or lisle stocking one can easily make up a little black cat such as is here shown.

Fold the stocking together from the seam towards the front and cut out a piece nine inches in length.

At the bottom it should measure at least nine and one-half inches around.

Five inches up from the bottom shape in a couple of inches so that around the line which marks the kitten's neck the measure will be about seven and one-half inches.

From here curve outward for the ear, which is three inches above the neck. Shape the ears as nearly as possible like the illustration. Then seam up, turn inside out, gather the bottom and draw it up closely about braided strands of stockings, used for the kitty's tail.

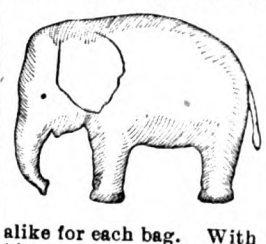
STOCKING CAT.

Mark the face with white silkateen, use two half-inch white pearl buttons, sewed on with black, for eyes.

Stuff with cotton batting, but do not fill too full as a cuddly, by-low toy should be soft.

For the New Baby

A bath-mat and a little wash-cloth wrapped around a soap kewpie makes a most useful and attractive gift. For the mat, which is designed for use in one's lap, a square of white rubber will be needed, a piece of Turkish toweling, a ball of silkateen and two yards of inch wide ribbon.



SONNY BOY WITH A BASKET OF APPLES.

With the silkateen crochet a picot edge around the toweling. Across one corner work the words Baby's Bath in cross-cross-stitch, place the rubber underneath in the center and tie in place by running the ribbons through and making bows in the four corners.

Animal Bean Bag

These little playthings can be made actually in a jiffy, as all the stitching can or rather should be done on the machine as it is so much stronger, and this quality is particularly necessary for these little bags which will be constantly handled and tossed about.

From pieces of canton flannel, wool flannel, cloth or felt, cut two pieces exactly alike for each bag. With the simplest possible outline indicate some little animal which will appeal to the little folks. The outlines here shown illustrate the idea, the elephant alone being the only form which would require anything but a small button or a heavily worked dot foran eye. On this the elephant's large ears should be outlined.

For patterns one can copy the figures from children's books, and in addition to these shown, little bears, pigs and kittens may be used. If light weight material is used, such as flannel, stitch all about on the wrong side, turn, poking out all the corners and stitch again on the right about a quarter inch in from the edge, fill full enough so each figure will be plump and close the remaining space by hand.

Doughnut Bean Bag

Very realistic are the bags made of golden brown silkateen. A trifling gift, perhaps, in some ways, but one which is sure to please a kiddie, whether boy or girl.

Begin with a ch 50 stitches, join in ring, 1 d c in each st, join, ch 2.

2nd row—1 d c in 24 sts, 2 d c in the next, 1 d c in 24 sts, 2 d c in the last, join, ch 2.

3rd row—1 d c in 4 sts, 2 d c in every 5th st, join, ch 2.

4th row—3 d c, 2 d c in every 4th st, join, ch 2.

5th row—2 d c in first st and the one about opposite.

GOLDEN BROWN DOUGHNUT.

6th row—Same as 4th row.

7th row—2 d c in every 3rd st, join, ch 2.

8th row—1 d c in each d c.

This completes one side. Now working in each stitch of the first chain, make the second side in the same way. Fill with beans and crochet together.

Gifts For Little Folks

A Bread-and-Milk Set

Little bibs or feeding sets, the making of which almost tells its own story in the illustration, are very popular with the little folks.

These can be made in a number of ways and of different materials, but are very satisfactory and attractive of unbleached muslin.

The tray-cloth may be 14 by 18 inches, the bib 13 by 16½ inches.

To shape the neck of this, fold lengthwise, measure five inches over from one end and mark with a pin.

Place another pin four and one-half inches down from the same edge, on the center fold. Round the neck from this pin to the first one. The neck may be finished with a tiny rolled hem, the other edges having one-half inch hems turned on the right and buttonholed down.

In finishing with a bias binding, fold the under edge ever so slightly beyond the upper, so that it will surely be caught when stitching.

In the outlined designs the main lines of the figures stand out best if worked with two threads of stranded cotton, but for the features, bunny's whiskers, etc., a single strand only is needed.

Colored chambray bibs with the figures outlined on white and then appliqued in place, and the edges finished with white rickrack braid, are also very pretty.

Two ducks facing each other, the cat and the fiddle repeated three times, a group of chicks or bunnies, or just a single figure, are but a few ways in which outlines such as are shown above may be used.

After finishing each piece, press and fold neatly and pack in a little box, adding a small card to the top with this jingle, which may be changed a little to suit the article sent, or one of your own making:

"The bib I'm sending you, my dear,
Bears Peter Rabbit and Humpty, too,
And when it's bread-and-milk time
They'll come and play with you."

Carriage Bootees

A six-inch square will be necessary to form the pattern. On the front side make a curve up two inches for the toe, and in to a point indicated by the bow; from here to the back measures four inches. Run line from here straight up to the top.

To cut bootee, lay straight back edge on a fold of material, and cut to shape. The shape of the sole can be traced from a child's shoe.

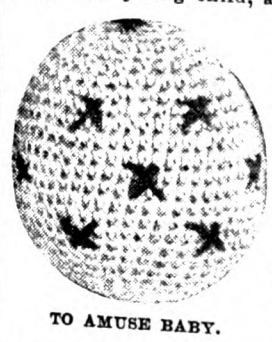
WARM CARRIAGE BOOTEES.

For this use cardboard for foundation to give a little stiffness, cover with eider-down on both sides, leaving edges raw. Baste the lining and outside of the upper part together, sew lower edge to sole. Bind all edges with inch-wide ribbon, as shown, finishing with bows and strings near the top of the sides for tying.

Rosette for Carriage Robe

For this simple but appropriate gift, for a wee baby, you will need two and one-half yards of three-inch pink or blue satin ribbon, one and one-half yards of inch ribbon.

Make a large, flat bow, having four five-inch loops and five ends of the inch ribbon. Of the inch ribbon make a rosette of two-inch loops and place in the center.



Shoe Forms

Who would not be pleased with a pair of these dainty little shoe forms which can be bought for the trifling sum of 10 cents and transformed in a jiffy with a little black paint?

Use this on the wooden toe pieces and the small balls. When thoroughly dry, paint in some small roses and green leaves in a group or semi-circle. Cover the steel springs between smoothly with a piece of pretty silk or wind round and round with a half-inch satin ribbon.

Crocheted Ball

A pretty gay ball is a nice and harmless plaything for a young child, and one which will please. Odds and ends of wool can be joined and worked up hit or miss, or one color used throughout and then cross-stitched, as shown, is attractive.

TO AMUSE BABY.

Begin with ch 4, join, 7 s c in ring, then 1 s c in a st, 2 s c in next st for 2 rounds, followed by 2 s c in each 3rd st. Make work to bowl until it measures about 3 inches across, then several rows of 1 st in each st, before shaping again by omitting instead of adding stitches. Stuff and then cross-stitch.

Timely Suggestions

The way a gift is given is really of almost as much importance as the gift itself. After that is selected and wrapped or boxed, just a few words besides the usual good wishes so often are necessary, yet few of us have the time, and still fewer the ability, to put just what we want to say into words. Little gift cards for many of the most frequently selected articles, such as gloves, handkerchiefs and stockings, may now be obtained. A few appropriate words may be used to accompany different small gifts.

Poppy Basket Envelope

Most popular are the woven envelope baskets, which one can get in all sizes. Some girls use the larger ones for carrying their daily lunches, others as a substitute for a hand bag, or in a bureau drawer for holding handkerchiefs or gloves, so, as they are so practical and useful, what girl could resist a case made gay and Christmasy with some small, brilliant flowers and some bright leaves?

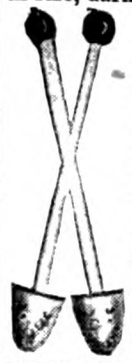
BRIGHT WITH WOOL FLOWERS.

Begin your decorating first by buttonholing the edge of the upper case and cross-pointing a three-inch space, to represent the lower part of a basket, with black wool.

Use bits of your most vivid wool to make the small hollyhock-like flowers. For each begin with a ch 3 stitches, join in a ring. Fill this with simple crochet stitches. Fasten this round, then ch 3, 1 s c in first st of ch 3. Repeat.

Make the flowers as full as possible, set in place closely bunched together, then connect with long stitches in two or more shades of bright green.

Guest Room Bouquet



As the desire to make one's guest as comfortable and happy as possible is general the little bouquet here illustrated has proved to be a most popular convenient affair.

It is supposed to contain everything but the sewing line which would prove convenient in case a few unexpected stitches were necessary. Besides the convenience it is a most attractive addition to a guest room bureau

CONVENIENT FOR THE WELCOME GUEST.

For its making one should have a small pair of scissors, a thimble, an emery, beeswax, cotton and silk in black, white, navy blue and perhaps light pink and blue, needles assorted in size, darning needles, hooks and eyes, black and white pins and safety pins of different sizes.

SHOE FORMS.

A little pink, blue and yellow crepe paper will also be needed, some hat frame wire, a few wooden skewers, a paper lace doily and a small yard of baby ribbon Stick the spools on the skewers, then cover each in a three-inch wide piece of crepe paper, using either blue or pink and finishing with a couple of rounds of green. Take some crepe paper in a rope and make into loops, wrap with paper wiring all together, then into a ball pin various sized safety pins, hooks on a wire hairpin, eyes and snaps on other pins and wrap described with crepe paper. Secure the paper of needles by running a wire through the fold and wrap in paper the same way. Make a loop of wire the size to fit the top of the thimble, just so it will not slip through, and wrap this also.

Use a small silk or satin-covered cushion, either light blue, pink or yellow for the center of the bouquet, wrapped in paper to match the other articles, and filled with pins. Surround this with the other things which have been described, placing between each a few artificial flowers if one has them. Any small ones, such as rosebuds, forget-me-nots or lilac from a dainty carded summer hat will answer and add much to the attractiveness of the whole bouquet. A place for the scissors can be made by tying a ribbon through two or three strong wire hairpins and knotting one end to the scissors, or they can be attached to the ribbon which holds the bouquet together. All of the articles used should be wrapped as described, and after surrounding the cushion wrap the whole in green paper, then slip through the center of a paper lace doily and tie securelyunderneath with a ribbon.

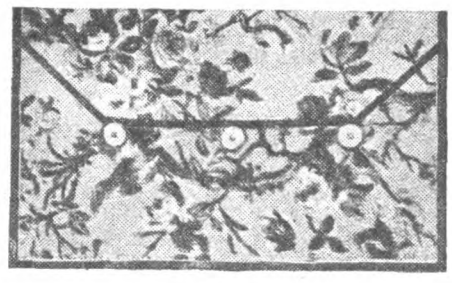
Cut the cretonne a half inch longer at top and bottom to allow for turning in.



Seam up and slip over the frame, arranging seam over a wire. If one is not successful in working in this way, pin in place, sew to a wire, turn in the other edge and slip stitch down. In making up in this manner, a strip of narrow galloon will have to be run from top to bottom over each wire to cover the joining. Finish with four-inch silk fringe and band of galloon at the heading and also around the top of the shade.

Fetching Slipper Case

A slipper case is another little article which can easily be made of a small piece of anything which is bright and attractive.

Cretonne is perhaps the best material, if one has to buy the needed amount.

In shape, the case is like a large envelope. Take a piece of material 10 by 27 inches, turn up one end about 12 inches. On each side insert a 12-inch fold strip about two and one-half inches wide to give spring to the case. Finish all edges around with a binding of narrow black satin ribbon or with bias binding in black or color.

Fold over the top to form a flap and sew on good firm snap fasteners.

"When packing for a little trip,
This snug little case
Will keep your extra slippers
In their proper place."

Hair Net Case

At the bottom of the next column is illustrated a clever idea for a hair-net case. For this one will need a cardboard drum or roll upon which ribbon comes wound.

Make an opening at the top about one-third of the distance around. Make and fit a little silk pocket into the inside, turning the edges down around the top and holding in place with a little paste.

Next cut two circles of silk an inch larger than the foundation.

The band for hanging should be just the width of the space between. Buttonhole all the raw edges closely with embroidery silk. Decorate one or both sides with a fancy piece of silk, a bit of applique or a few flowers simply outlined.

Send with a card bearing these words:

"Hair nets, hair nets,
Apt to fly away,
So just tuck inside
Where they'll stay."

Receipt Folder

In a recipe case like the one illustrated below you may present to an expectant bride or old housekeeper a set of cards bearing your tried and choicest recipes. It is simply a folder of heavy paper, ornamental in design and attractive in color, measuring six by nine inches, and tied securely through the center with a red ribbon.

FOLDER FOR RECIPES.

On the outside, letter and paste in place a small white card bearing these appropriate words:

"The recipes within You'll find
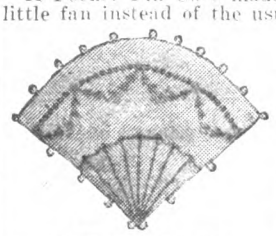
Are the finest
Of their kind."

Polly Prim Polisher

The lines below come with a five-inch square of lamb's wool, the back of which as illustrated is covered with flowered cretonne, neatly stitched down along the edge. Any design for the back, in making up a gift for the holiday season, can be used. A silhouette of a young girl in full skirt and broad hat, cut from black kid or velvet, forms a handle and helps to make a very attractive and helpful whole, as described and shown here.

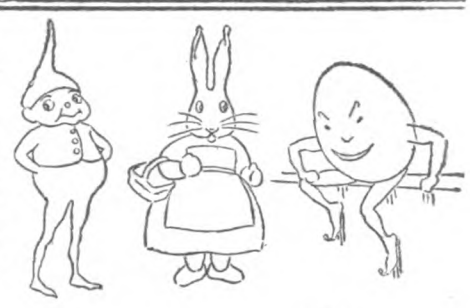


AN ORIGINAL POLISHER.

"A Polly Prim polisher for your shoes
Is just the little gift I choose,
To carry loving thoughts to you
And give you faithful service, too."

Pocket Pin Case

A Pocket Pin Case made in the shape of a little fan instead of the usual cricle is attractive. Cut a three-inch square of cardboard, cover both sides with sheet wadding after shaping as shown.



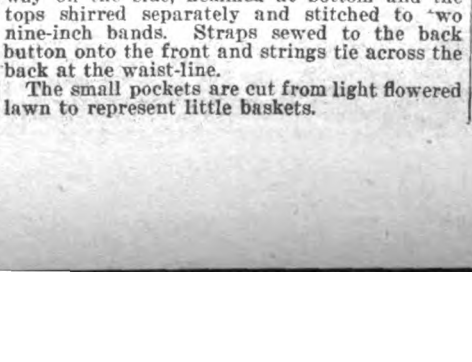
DAINTY PIN CASE.

The model is of plain buff silk, trimmed with fine gold cord, and a row of loops embroidered with green lazy-daisy stitches and tiny pink roses. Fill with different colored round-headed pins.

Making Aprons of What You Have

It is the exceptional woman or child who does not have a use for an apron of some sort, so just to give one a few ideas of how attractive and becoming these necessary little articles may be, we are very glad to be able to illustrate a few of the ways in which materials on hand can be utilized.

A dress which is out of date or worn, or two yards of bright cretonne may be very easily made up into the gay slip-over (Fig. 1) which is so becoming any girl will be glad of an excuse for wearing. This is fashioned by sewing a full skirt onto the straight waistline of the front which runs from a four-inch band in the back up to the bib in front, which is cut straight across the top, from either side of which bands go over the shoulders and down the back to the waist-band.



APRONS ARE AS BECOMING AS THEY ARE USEFUL.

Strings of the same are used for tying.

The apron shown on Fig. 2 one would little guess when finished that the materials once did duty as dad's or brother's shirt. When these garments, however, are past repair, it is possible and practical to utilize them in this way if the materials are good.

From the back of the shirt one can get the center piece and from the front the side pieces. The extra pieces used in trimming should be of a decided contrast. Nos. 3, 4 and 5 show other smaller aprons, each of them made of numerous pieces, which may be of the same or different materials. The lines are so simple they may be easily copied, and one or more will certainly make a worthwhile present for any busy housekeeper.

No. 4 is a good suggestion for combining the rich, creamy tint of unbleached and a bit of color applique in flower forms.

No. 5, with its two deep pockets, is a useful design for a sewing apron. The edges are finished with wide rickrack braid.

For children, aprons and bibs are a real necessity but they are now so interesting that the little ones delight in wearing them.

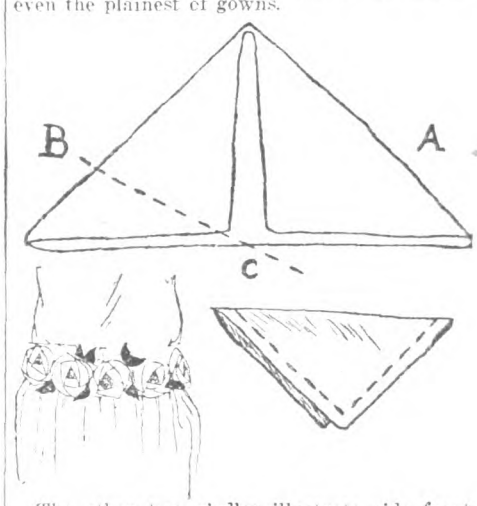
The little models hanging on the line are really simplicity itself, as each is cut in a single piece. The straps button on the shoulders, after crossing in the back. Nos. 6 and 7 are designed especially for feeding bibs and have pockets placed, as shown, to catch any stray bits of food. The numerals or alphabet in outline will prove instructive as well as amusing to a child of three or four years. The third design is for general use and may be dressed up by outlining little bunnies, chicks or ducks across the bottom. Bind or hem all edges, afterwards overcasting in both directions to make cross-stitches.

No. 9 is a bread-and-milk bib, with sleeves, for a younger child. This also has a pocket across the whole lower section of the front. The sleeves are cut kimono style, and the back of the bib only comes to the waistline, fastening with one button at the neck.

HAIR NET CASE.

For a little girl, an all white apron is often desirable so we picture the little model, No. 10, to prove that daintiness need not be sacrificed to serviceability.

Shirr lawn or dimity or sateen would work up very prettily in this way. The back and front are both square pieces, seamed up half way on the side, hemmed at bottom and the tops shirred separately and stitched to two nine-inch bands. Straps sewed to the back button onto the front and strings tie across the back at the waist-line.



The small pockets are cut from light flowered lawn to represent little baskets.

Smart Girdles for Gifts

As girdles are worn with dresses for all occasions, a few designs featuring the small silk roses, now so popular, furnish ideas for home-made models which are very dainty and attractive.

For light voile or silk dresses nothing is prettier than one of these girdles made of several lengths of black velvet ribbon, upon which rest the roses.

The top girdle will require 10 yards of No. 2 ribbon. Cut into five pieces, varying in length. This joins in the back with two roses and the ends, while across the front are roses placed as closely together as possible. The sketch below gives one a good idea of the appearance of the girdle as worn, and of what it will add to even the plainest of gowns.

The other two girdles illustrate side front decorations, one showing loops of piping cord covered with green silk, just below a group of three roses, and the other two roses made up of two shades of material.

Silk Rambler Roses

For the center of each flower one may use either a few yellow flower centers or, if not obtainable, cut a one and one-half inch circle of silk, gather around the edge, draw up and fill with cotton.

For small roses, cut from nine to 11 pieces of silk into squares measuring three inches. fold together diagonally as shown in detail above and gather along the two raw edges, as shown, and draw up.

Around the center arrange three petals, each overlapping the other as indicated in sketch. Follow with next round, and the balance in the last round.

Leaves of bits of velvet are sometimes also added most effectively between the roses, and for these cut a piece of velvet at least one and one-half by three inches. Fold in the ends of each side towards the center as shown in illustration.

Then fold side A over to side B and run in a gathering thread from point B to C.

A Gala Week at Geneva

THE great Gordon Bennett International Balloon Race was started on Sunday, August 6, from Geneva, Switzerland. This was the culminating event so far as the aerial part was concerned of a gala week of celebrations in this beautiful Swiss city.

I had no intention of participating in any of the events, but was one day invited by the Swiss army officer in charge to make an ascent in the captive balloon from which the parachute jumping was taking place.

I spent the greater part of the week watching the aerial events, in which I am so keenly interested.

There were races of other sorts during the week, including bicycle, motorcycle and motor car races. Aquatic sports were carried out on Lake Geneva; there was a monster fireworks display, and Geneva generally outdid herself.

The Gordon Bennett International Balloon Race

But the great event for all was, of course, the Gordon Bennett International Balloon race, it being held in Switzerland this year in honor of the fact that a Swiss competitor won the event last year.

This annual race, which, of course, did not take place during the years of the war, was established by James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, with his gift of an international challenge cup. The cup was to go to the country which should win three times in succession. This triple feat has never been accomplished, America having been the only country to win twice in succession, in 1909 and 1910.

The starting point was laid down to be in the country of the winner of the previous year. The conditions were also that the pilots should, if possible, remain in the air two nights, the race being limited to forty-eight hours and the trophy being awarded to the aeronaut traveling the longest distance as measured in a straight line from the starting point.

Seven countries took part in the first race—the same as this year, except that Germany was included and that Switzerland was absent. It started from the Tuileries Gardens, Paris, on a memorable day, September 20, 1906, and America, represented by F. P. Lahn, was the winner.

The American team was composed of Major Oscar Westover, who piloted an army balloon and had as assistants, Lieut. Carleton F. Bond, who accompanied him in the car, and Lieuts. William E. Connelly and William Hoffman; Lieut. W. Read, who had charge of a navy balloon and had as an alternate, Commander Norfleet and was accompanied in the race by Chief Slade; Mr. Honeywell, well-known manufacturer of balloons in America, who piloted the third entry, a special type of his own construction.

Three Former Winners

Three notable former winners were in this year's race: Captain Armbxuster (Switzerland), last year's winner; Lieut. Demuyter (Belgium), winner in 1920, and the veteran, Maurice Bienaime (France), winner in 1912, who made the great flight of 2,200 kilometers far into Russia.

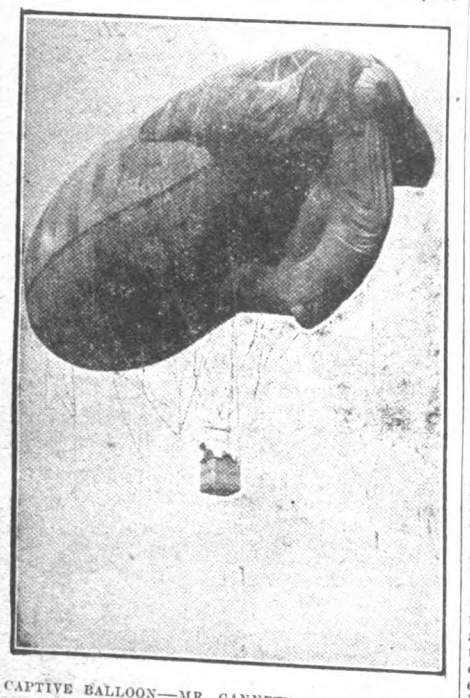
Entries apart from America were:

England—Ernest Allen and Griffith Brewer.

Belgium—Lieut. Labrousse, Captain George and E. Demuyter.

France—Maurice Bienaime, Georges Cormier and Jules Dubois.

Spain—E. Magdalena and F. Martinez Sanz.



Italy—Barbanti, G. Valle and A. Guglielmetti.

Switzerland—Captain Armbxuster, Lieut. Ansermier and Major Gerber.

For a description of the more important events of the week, as I witnessed them, I will quote from my diary as follows:

As Told in My Diary

Geneva, Wednesday, August 2.—Evidently Nature did not want the people here to have the human fireworks as a monopoly of pyrotechnics last evening, so she got up a roaring thunder and lightning storm just as they were ready to start. This happened to be just as I was arriving back from my trip to Montreux so there was not much celebrating last night.

An aeroplane went over yesterday afternoon while we were way up 6,000 feet high, so I could get an idea of how it was on Saturday, when I flew over from Paris this same way, for they seemed to be a long way above us. What seemed like ordinary flat fields and table land was this high, mountainous, broken country. I can now better understand, for it looks all level enough when looking down on it from away up in the air.

The fireworks are to go off tonight. There were heaps of paper Japanese lanterns ruined but the bunting pennants over the bridge and along the party ways are still flying gaily. I have just met Major Westover, the balloon pilot from the U. S. Army. He was at West Point at the same time my son-in-law, Major Farnum, was there.

Preliminary Balloon Races

There is a little balloon racing this afternoon which I am going to see. Major Westover goes into the big race on Sunday.

Wednesday afternoon.—I am out at the field to see the first balloon races for short distance flights. At 6 o'clock. Not a very large crowd as I presume everybody is more interested in the Sunday event when the Gordon Bennett Cup will be raced for.

The wind seems to be blowing lightly right away from the Swiss Alps so think it will be good for the start. There are six balloons ready to go—mostly French—no Americans.

There is a low-priced flying service from here to Zurich and return the same day for only $22.00 but I do not think I will fly any more until I return to Paris and can fly into Belgium and Holland and back to London by air.

I have just met two more American officers who are looking for a balloon to enter a race with.

The people out here on the field are all Swiss or French. Most of them are sitting about in the restaurant tents drinking wine or beer.

Just met an American pilot—Hoffman—who is going into the novelty race tomorrow, a hare and hounds race which is also followed by automobiles. The six balloons all got off nicely with a north wind, so they sailed away very prettily together. There were some women who went along as well as the men. They say that higher up the winds blow south, so they are keeping fairly low down.

Thursday A. M., Aug. 3.—They did pull off a good show of fireworks last evening between 9:30 and 10:30. They had all kinds, and the sky was alive with all sorts of shooting star rockets, bombs, etc. I had a nice seat on the balcony, where I ate and sat through it all in the pale moonlight. There must have been half of Geneva out to see the works, all concentrated within half a mile of these bridges and parks. It took until midnight for the crowds to disperse.

I have just been to the American Consul to get a card to the secretary of the balloon events so as to have the privileges of a press representative.

Succeeded in getting my card, so I am now a full-fledged Press reporter. I met the New York Herald and the local press reporters. I also met Lieut. Connelly and Lieut. Reed of the American Army and Navy, and some other good Americans, so get some real American English spoken first hand.

Balloon Races with Automobiles Following

The races this morning have nine entries and are called "Hare and Hounds Race," the hare starting a little ahead of the hounds who following in close order, just a few minutes apart from each other, and are supposed to land as near as possible to the hare, who drops within an hour of the starting time.

Then to make it more interesting they have autos follow along by road to see who can get the nearest to the landing place of the hare.

They have a sort of fairway through which they lead the balloons all strung along in a line up to the front of the grandstand, they being all so well balanced that a few men can guide them along very easily. As they are led along, one behind the other, they look like a drove of elephants, except that the balloons are spherical in shape. They have one of the sausage-shaped army balloons for a captive balloon here on the field.

At 11 o'clock no word had been received from any of the six balloons that started on a long-distance race yesterday, but they were supposed to remain up about 24 hours. The light winds today took these balloons off to the North at the same speed and in the same direction as yesterday.

Lieut. Hoffman succeeded in getting a small balloon and entered in the Hare and Hounds race all alone. I had an American flag and gave him a good wave as he gracefully left the ground. Some of the large balloons had four and five people, some women going along.

The Belgian balloon got what they call a false lift and they thought she would touch the ground before she finally got away, but some sand bags hastily emptied soon put her up in the air and over the tree tops and grandstand.

There was an aeroplane flying about after all the balloons started yesterday and I thought I would like to be up in one and chase them up, but there are no spare machines around here. Have not seen any today. The Fox films are taking movies of the balloons. I happened to be in one of the "close-ups," Panama hat and American flag and all.

Up 2,000 Feet in a Captive Balloon

Thursday P. M.—Well, I had quite a little experience this afternoon while out watching the parachute jumping from a captive balloon. The Swiss army officer who has charge of all the starting of the balloons in the races also had charge of these events, and as he can talk English pretty well, he asked me if I would like to go up two thousand feet and look at Geneva from the sausage-shaped captive balloon they were using for the jumping. Perhaps I am unconsciously taking on an International Air Voyager's appearance. This may be the reason he singled me out in the bunch as the only one to receive such an invitation.

I could not very well refuse, so accepted and took my turn right after the first jumper had safely landed. I told him I was used to seeing ski jumping but this was my first sight of a real army parachute jumper.

I was piloted up by Lieut. Theo Frick and we were the only passengers in the basket of this great army balloon. I am not keen on captive balloons, for if anything should break one is liable to be off for a long journey without any ballast or any control over the air monster, and they do look like monsters of the great elephant class. The side wings look like elephant ears as the wind makes them seem to gently fan the air. They act like the small fins back of the gills on a fish. Then the funny protuberance at the head looks like the curled up trunk of the elephant and acts like the keel of a ship to take the wind easily. Although near the head it acts as a rudder, or the tail of a fish.

We ascended very easily and gracefully, the wire cable being unwound from a windlass on the body of a big truck that has an easy-running but powerful motor. When we were up about two thousand feet I told my pilot that was high enough for me to get a good view of the city and the running together of the two great rivers. This last view is the one known as the "Water's Meet." Here the Arve with its muddy waters joins the Rhone with its clear water. They make a broad turn around and partly blend together right under where we were poised. The pilot blew his bugle three blasts and the motor below was shut off and we remained stationary for a while. This is the only time any motion is felt. There is quite a severe rocking of the basket but not for long, and as we quieted down I took a good look about the city and country from our elongated Eiffel Tower, or Woolworth

I had watched the flowing together of rivers, both on the ground and from running aeroplane a mile high. Now good chance to look down on this waters while standing still as from a ment. It proved quite an inspiring here as the nasty-colored, foul-looking of the muddy Arve flowed head on side of the pure, deep, clear waters of You can clearly see the befouled water gradually working itself into pure water of the other river, first vided in the center about half-clear dirty water, and then, as it flows clear waters being befouled two-thirds it all looks nasty and muddy as it around a bend. Then, as it flows curving around still more, the waters widen and deepen until the two rivers become one. Gaining more strength more swiftly on towards Lake Geneva, ally clears itself and becomes a very and pure body of active running water.

As I looked down on the marvelous took place away below me, I wondered impure thoughts that come sometimes mind cannot be likened to the muddy seem at first to be the dominating Then as the better and purer nature the pure thoughts sort of deepen and strengthen until the pure predominates evil is obliterated.

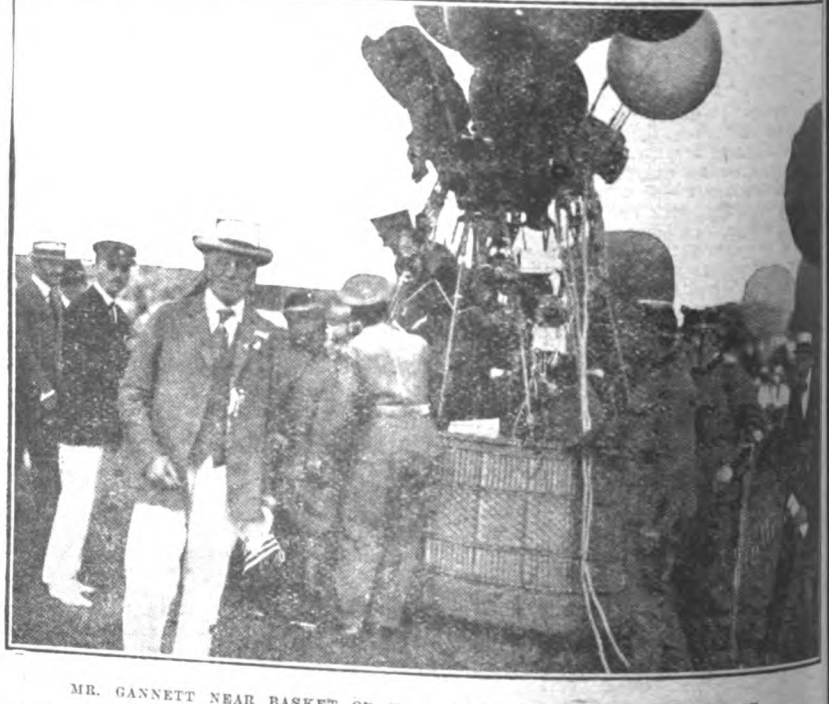
There is material for a sermon in this may have been preached, but it is the was given me away up in the sky over Switzerland.

M. Blanchet, pilot of the Fernando, balloon, has telegraphed of his landing across the Mediterranean. He was one six starters yesterday.

The parachutist, Ernest Buser, gave me card picture of himself and he kindly sent it within two minutes of his successful from a jump. He came down safely ten feet of some woods. I noticed that enced as he is, his hand was trembling he signed the card for me.

Balloon Race for Location

Friday, August 4.—In this balloon day, for location, they call it, that is, landing nearest a given place within the lotment wins—there were fourteen starters being Swiss, the others French, Italian gians—no Americans or British being but I waved the Stars and Stripes to loon as it started.



They seem to have a lot of these balloons over here, thirty different ones having been inflated from this one gas here on the field; and they seem to have of gas left for the nineteen others, all that are to ascend Sunday.

The race today was the most interesting watch of any thus far sent off, as the still and the distance short, we could only the ascent but most of the descent. They seemed to start off a little toward —or heading for Mt. Blanc—and then around a while—or drifting lazily along as they reached a little higher altitude currents would take them to the South in the direction of the foot of the lake.

The occupants were made up of from pilot to a party of four or five men and some just a man and woman. One lady tracted much attention from the fact that little eight-year-old Swiss miss went along tily dressed in white. While we were these fourteen balloons, nearly all of which bunched quite near together, not very the air, a captive spherical balloon was to give a close-up demonstration of the of a balloon. They did not ascend very the pilot immediately pulled the cord to gas valve placed at the top of the balloon it descended right on the field where standing, we, of course, did not care to close on account of inhaling the fumes of caping gas. It was a very quiet landing not being any wind stirring, and thus exciting as the three different countries we were going at full speed, but it gave of how one is enveloped in the big gas bag hitting the ground and the gas has escaped.

All of the fourteen balloons that started this morning's race could now be seen ing, none having gone a great many miles account of quiet air movement, as there short time limit put on this race.

In the hare and hounds race of yesterday Lieutenant Connelly just told me that he in an automobile with Mrs. Connelly and to keep in close touch with Lieutenant Hoffman the only American who started in that race one time Lieutenant Hoffman came down his balloon, hiding behind a clump of trees bushes very close to the elusive hare which mediately took the air again, with him following. Hoffman had the smaller balloon being alone could handle it quite dexterously and finally did succeed in almost catching the foxy hare. I believe the trick is settled by delivering of a letter or parcel to the lucky the fortunate hound who catches her.

There is to be another demonstration of parachute jumping this afternoon and then nothing doing in the air line until the big Cup Race Sunday. That will take all day filling the balloons and getting ready for the start.

There is to be a big banquet tonight and then tomorrow come the Aquatic Sports on the Lake, water polo, boat racing, swimming contest, etc.

The winners of the combined balloon and motor-car competition which took place yesterday are announced as follows: (A) Balloons—

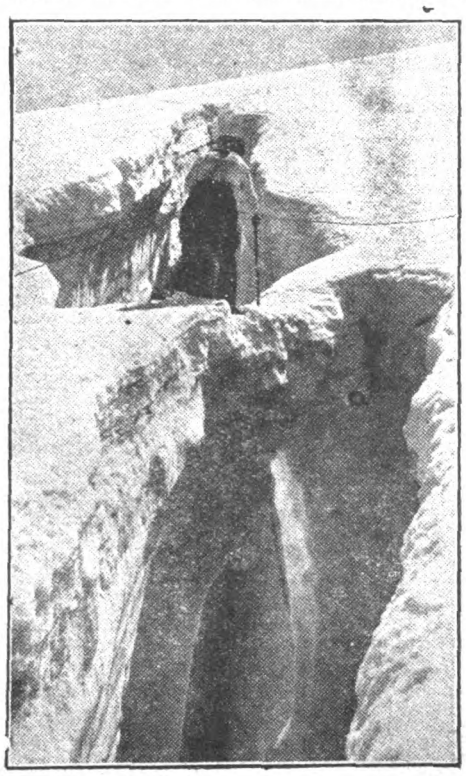
by Airplane Covers Six Countries in Flight of Two Thousand Five Hundred Miles

PIPING THE STARTING SIGNALS WITH HUNDRED-YEARS-OLD SWISS ALPINE HORN.

Cumulus, piloted by Comte de la Vaulx; 2, Azuria, piloted by Major Gerber, Switzerland. (B) Motor-cars—1, M. Gallay, Geneva; 2, M. Welti, Geneva.

Saturday, August 5:—The winners of the balloon direction race, which took place yesterday, were: (1) Signor Valle, Italy, who landed one thousand yards from the landing place he had chosen.; (2) M. Cormier, France; (3) M. Demuyter, Belgium. At the moment of starting the pilots had to choose their landing place, and they had to try to land as near it as possible.

The competitors for the six days' motorcycle race arrived yesterday night at Lugano, where they are resting today. There is a very close fight between the British and Swiss national teams, the former trying to win the championship, which is held by Switzerland. The British team is a few points ahead. On Monday the competitors leave Lugano and go to Beren over the St. Gothard Pass.



Big Gordon Bennett Race Starts

Sunday, August 6:—All balloons entering the Gordon Bennett Cup Race are spherical and contain eighty thousand cubic feet of gas—over four times as large as the one Lieutenant Hoffman used in the hare and hounds race Thursday. The baskets measure about three feet by six feet. It is a busy place early Sunday morning as one views the large aviation field, with nineteen of these large gas bags spread upon the ground, nets being covered over the silken bags; two hundred sand bags distributed around the large circle enclosing the net to which they are attached in the slow process of inflation. It will tax the great gas tanks to their utmost to get them all filled within the four hours allowed for this process, but Lieutenant Connelly, who is general manager of the American Air Team, says there are two million feet of gas in the tanks and only one million, six hundred thousand feet are required for the twenty balloons to be filled today and this filling process is all done at one time.

There is a crew of twenty-five men allowed to each balloon as helpers in the filling. There is a narrow-gauge railroad running around the field, on which a hand car is run to distribute the equipment.

In filling, the American Army balloon is the first one to get the gas, so let's hope she is the first to get the start—and also the cup. As far as I can learn there is no other American special press representative here and I think I am the only man in the world to come to the balloon races by aeroplane, which will probably not be the case next year as flying becomes safer and more popular.

The three Belgians have first place, being one, two and three in the start. The American Army balloon has place No. 4, American Civilian No. 5, American Navy No. 6. Major Westover and Lieut. Bond piloted this same Army balloon from Milwaukee to near Labrador, 863 miles. The balloon is the only one fitted with an awning or oscillating damper running all around the bag, to assist in landing and other maneuvering. The outfits carried are about the same in each basket, suitable clothing, food and instruments being taken to enable one to exist at least forty-eight hours. A rifle is also taken. The Civilian balloon won second place and the Navy third in the Milwaukee race this year. All American teams are carrying a supply of oxygen.

The dull air of the morning has livened up in the afternoon, so there is a nice easy breeze the right direction to take the balloons up Lake Geneva instead of away over the Alps in the direction of Mt. Blanc, as was feared.

It could not be better, being low wind on ground and high wind above, says Hoffman. The Swiss helpers around the American balloons have kept the different pilots busy signing and autographing cards.

The balloons are all sent off promptly three minutes apart, starting at 4 P. M.

Quite a busy time about 2.30 P. M. when all pilots go to headquarters on field to get their cars and sign out.

I am well decorated with balloon badges, press tag, American flags, and a pennant same as is carried on army balloon, given me by Pilot Hoffman.

The sun is quite hot. Don't know how many thousands are here, but being Sunday and such a good day there are many, many people about watching the preparations for the start in this great race on a long journey into Nature's most hazardous territory. Quite a number of Americans are present.

Many small test balloons are sent up to give air current direction.

An aeroplane is now flying over; it is 3.45. Four planes now appear and then the parachute jumps from the big military balloon take place.

Now it is time for balloons to get away. The bugle from the gas tank has just signaled to go. I have just shaken hands with Major Westover and Lieuts. Bond and Hoffman, and bid them Godspeed.

The three Belgians are all in the air flying serenely along towards Lausanne and now comes the American Army balloon amid loud cheers from the hundreds there bidding it Godspeed, with the music of the Swiss Alpine horn sounding its pure Swiss notes as coming from the mountain passes of Mt. Blanc, and I waved the Stars and Stripes as they were off for their long journey into unknown lands with the big American flag flying from the immense bag.

I gave up my pennant to a pilot of the civilian balloon to hang on his basket.

Here comes No. 13 being towed up to the starter. She is called the Bee—the Queen Bee of Great Britain, no doubt—for she is from England and the band plays "God Save the King" as she goes gaily above.

The British balloon is the only one with wireless equipment, a large wooden frame being hung from the basket for the equipment, it being strung with a lot of fine wires, so looks like a mammoth zither, octagonal in shape.

Several more naval men have arrived and now the Navy gets her send-off. I told Lieut. Reed she ought to be lucky for she has a bunch of thirteen small balloons hung over this pilot's head in the rigging of the network of cords above. They being brave sailors, stand on the edge of the basket as they ascend, and one wipes a lot of perspiration from his brow and throws it to the ground to lighten their load, and create a laugh.

Our civilian, H. E. Honeywell, No. 5, got an extra fine send-off and I gave him a parting yodel and yell.

At six o'clock all the balloons are still in sight, there is so little wind.

It is remarkable that throughout the whole week with forty-nine ascensions there has been but one accident. On Thursday a military balloon envelope developed a fault while in air, and in its quick descent a pilot's assistant suffered a broken leg.

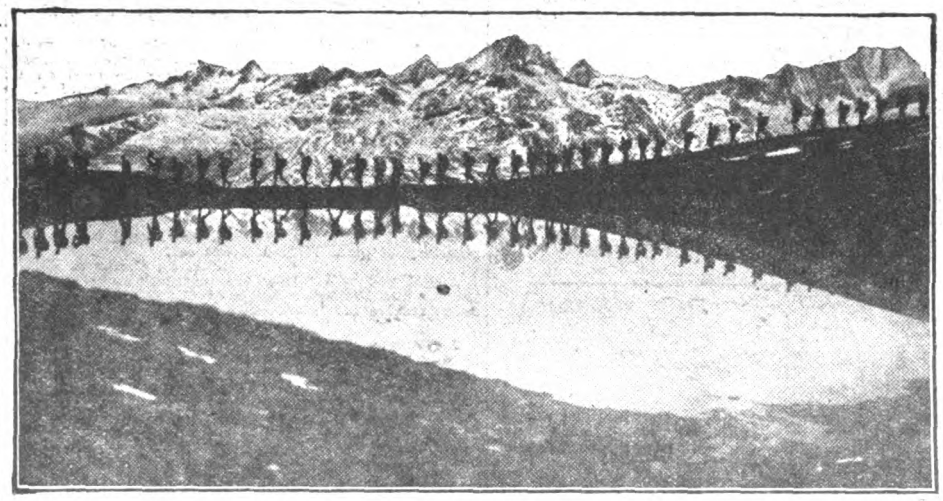
One competitor—a Spanish balloon—came down soon after the start—a torn envelope.

It now looks as though the wind might carry the competitors to Norway or Sweden.

The direction taken emphasizes the importance of the agreement come to by the pilots that Russia shall be considered as forbidden territory. Unless the air currents are found, landings are probable on this side of the line agreed upon as the boundary barring Russia.

Winter Sports in Mid-Summer

Wengen, Switzerland, August 7th.—This is a fine place and I should have arranged a longer stay so as to have gone further along on the little railroad that cogs itself up the mountain, for I have not found the spot that makes me feel I have really arrived. Perhaps St. Moritz will give it to me. If not, will decide on this place for a week's stay next winter.



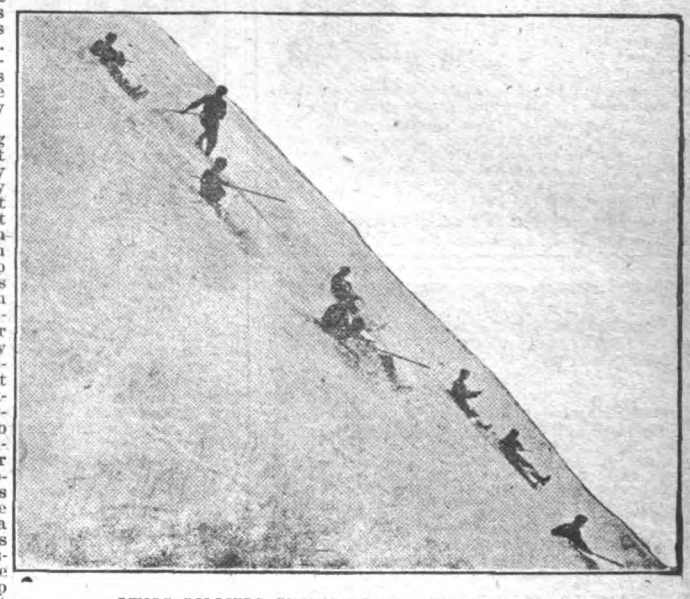
I have a dandy room and the ice and snow does look pretty near from here. It must be melting a lot by the amount of water coming over the cascades and down the river.

August 8.—Here at Wengen they say the temperature does not rise above 60 degrees in the summer, nor go below 20 degrees in the winter, so what more could one want for a comfortable temperature as it is said there is usually about enough snow to make good sporting over the ski runs and jumps built by nature.

There are heaps of people coming in on these many eight-car electric trains, but very few Americans. I am about the only person on this long train going out this morning en route for St. Moritz. A good many bicycles hereabouts. It's hard walking them up the steep grades, but mighty easy coming down.

I thought I was going to bed very early last night—and I felt so very sleepy after the hard day of Sunday, but the effect of seeing the rays of soft light stealing softly from behind these great high mountains kept me up quite late, for having this wonderful bright moon just at its full on coming out on such a clear night after such a rainy day was really a transformation one could not help enjoying to its utmost. The great snow-white mountains here do stand up so majestically from this particular spot from where this hotel is located. It makes a genuinely ideal place from which to enjoy a sublime view of Nature's great upheaval of massive granite. And as the moon finally came up from behind these great peaks, first casting its soft light before it and rising above in all its great fullness, the scene that was presented was certainly one never to be forgotten. And now something awoke me early this morning and just made me get up and take this fine view of the sunrise that words cannot describe.

The sun setting was just as fine as it could be after the showers of the day, and I have certainly been fortunate in having such fine weather given me during my brief stay so as to get the most there is to be had from my little visit. An inspiring sunset and a glorious moon rise as well as this splendid sun coming up.



SWISS SOLDIERS IN THE ALPS NEAR ANDAMATT CLOSE TO ITALIAN BORDER.

Isn't Nature grand! Yes—that's what I was thinking as at five o'clock this morning I am up and out on my balcony, with my winter overcoat and Panama hat on, looking straight into the bright eyes of this dear young Frau who enticingly beckons me with her entrancing smile and radiant, sun-warmed, snow-covered peak, to come up and sit beside her on her glacial couch. She evidently thinks as did good Mother Eve—that much clothing is not necessary, although her seat must feel a bit cool, even if Old Sol is casting his rays over her sides and clothing her with the glowing light from his spreading sunbeams as he slowly rises, tempering the early cool morning air with congenial heat.

Dawn of a Perfect Day

The sublime stillness of this mountain air, the subtle hush given the quick-moving waters as they flow rapidly down the green hillside below their great white ice and snow covered parents towering far above, gives a God-like aspect to this broad scene of indescribable grandeur. Cascades and beautiful waterfalls come into more distinct view as the softness and greater light comes stealing over the sky, cast from the fast-spreading rays of the glorious sunrise, bringing nearer and nearer, clearer and clearer, the view of this marvelous mountain panorama. It is now most prfectly and distinctly shown across the broad horizon of that great natural mansion in the skies—God's house—without any walls on this most wonderful dawn of a perfect day.

And now, my dear young Frau, you gay glacier-gowned queen of the Alps, I must bid you adieu, but having seen you from my aeroplane over a hundred miles afar, and then coming right into the heart of you, in fact, almost sitting in your very spacious lap, I can but promise to return to you and further explore your fair face and form, for your fine proportions are propitious for a tarry that is long.

Parting Brings Regret

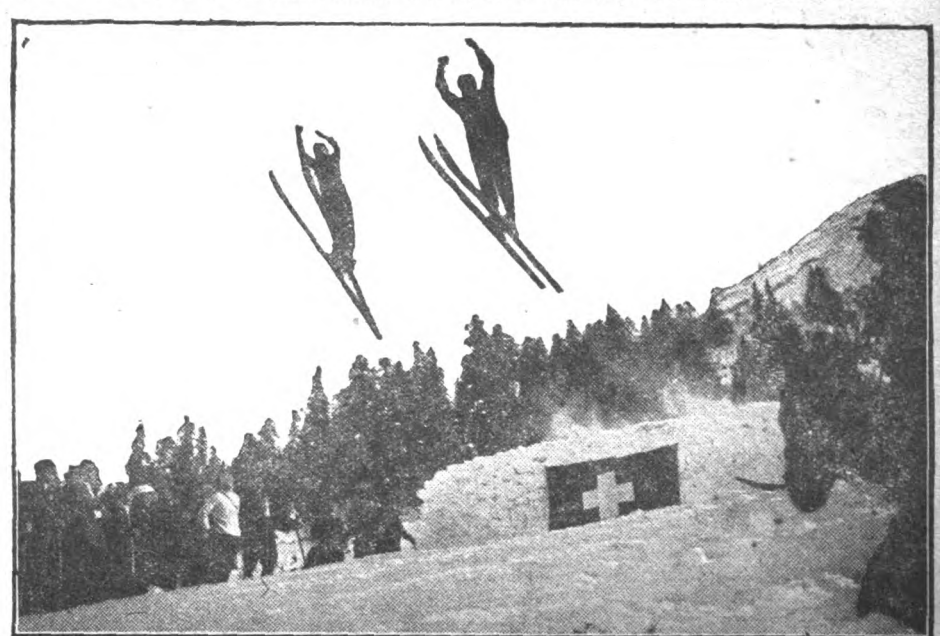
In coming down the Funicular at Interlaken, I met a Danish lady who can talk English and she said she took the trip way up and back to Jungfraujoch where I have marked, in one day. Guess I ought to have put in a day or two longer in this section so as to cover the snow places. They had a squall of snow while she was up there. Have just taken this trip up the Harderkulm by Funicular railway at Interlaken while I am waiting for train.

Had several hours' wait here at Interlaken and am now leaving for St. Moritz, going by motor car from Meringen to Gletsch today from Gletsch to Coire the same way tomorrow. Arrive at 9.43 P. M., so guess it is some trip as we leave at 8 A. M., making a long day of it, but don't leave Coire until 10.25 next morning and arrive at St. Moritz at 1.40, so that will give a resting chance.

Like Lakes of Maine

As we motor bus along the narrow roads over the mountains going from Wengen to St. Moritz, we pass two little lakes of very clear black water like Maine. Just below it is the dirty water same as the Arve. The clear water from the lakes comes from the ledges but the muddy water comes from a gravelly soil which accounts for muddy water of Arve and clear of Rhone. A pretty view from here, higher up as we bus along, looking back through the notch to high snow-capped peaks.

Soon we are really at Hotel de Rhone des Alps and can look right up on to this great mass of ice frozen in between the high ledges, and as we see the water flowing out from under this frozen mass can now say I have been to the mouth of the Rhone as well as its source, as the mouth of the glacier makes the course of the Rhone. I have seen this long river flowing along its shore from an aeroplane high in the sky and also on foot as well as from the military balloon. Now I have come through the narrow passes by motor car, crossing mountains 7,500 feet high to arrive at this spot where the varying waters are seen sweeping down through the gorges on to Geneva and its great lake.



Gletsch—August 9th

It surely was a nice trip over the mountains 7,500 feet high in the big motor bus yesterday to the mouth of the Rhone Glacier here at Gletsch. This ice is about 1,500 feet thick at the mouth which is the source of the Rhone River that has its mouth in Geneva miles and miles away. I am out at 6.30 A. M. writing this, looking right on to the ice which is 1,000 feet away. Sun is just coming up. We leave at 8 o'clock; I must go to breakfast at 7.

When I first looked at this fill of ice from Gletsch I guess it was 50 feet and then a hundred and finally 150, but as we came up to its top it was 1,000 and finally decided on at least 1,500 feet thickness of ice laid between these ledges. We walked out on it and into the ice grotto. Ten minutes' stop allowed here. There had been a big rock slide so a bridge has been built near hotel. We all got out of bus and walked across.

It was nice to really get right on top of the source of the Rhone and now I can say I have

The Construction of a Regenerative Receiving Set

PART II.

IN our November issue we described in detail the construction of the antenna coil and the tickler coil. The next step is to mount the tickler coil in its proper position which is inside the antenna coil. The shaft of the tickler coil is made in two parts, and is placed in the coil through the two holes provided for it. It is held in place by coating the shaft with shellac, or glue may be used if necessary. Before making the shaft fast in the tickler coil, however, the coil should be placed inside the antenna coil so that the shaft holes are in line with the two holes made in the antenna cord for the shaft. The shaft should then be put through the two holes in each side of the coils and made fast.

It is best to place a fiber washer on each shaft between the tickler coil and the antenna coil to prevent any side play in the tickler coil. The two ends of the tickler coil are now soldered to the ends of the shaft inside the coil. The entire coil is now complete and all that is left to make the inductance unit complete is to make the bearings for the shafts. As the coil is now, the holes in the aerial coil are through the tube only, which allows the shafts to wabble.

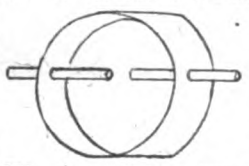

FIG. 1.—TICKLER COIL SHAFT IN TWO PARTS.

The bearings consist of two strips of brass cut the same length as the antenna coil tube, and in each one three holes are drilled of the same sizes and exact center to center spacing as those in the antenna coil tube. When this has been done, they are slipped over the shafts and are held at a distance of one-fourth inch from the winding by means of a 6-32 machine screw at each end. In order to make this come out right, the following procedure is necessary:

A fiber washer is first slipped over the screw, the screw is inserted in the tube from the inside, another washer which is held in place by a 6-32 nut, a space of one-fourth inch is left, then a 6-32 nut, the bearing and another nut.

The top screw should be left a little longer than the bottom to allow a narrow strip of this copper or flexible wire to be soldered to it. This strip should be about five inches long and is wound around the shaft like a clock spring and one end is soldered to the shaft, while the other end is soldered to the top machine screw. This provides a positive connection to the tickler coil and eliminates all possibility of a noisy tickler connection. A good point to bear in mind when placing these "Pigtail" connections is to solder them on in such a manner that when one winds up, the other will unwind. This tends to prevent their tearing off.

Referring to Fig. 3, notice that on one bearing 6-32 screws are used and on the other 8-32 screws are used. The 8-32 screws are used on the front bearing, one facing the panel, as they must also serve to hold the coil in position on the panel. Be sure the long shaft is used on this side of the coil as it must come through the panel and take a dial.

We can do nothing further with the inductance coil until the baseboard and panel are ready for mounting the condenser and inductance.

The baseboard should be of hard wood, preferably quartered oak, mahogany or maple. Ordinary birch will take a very good cherry stain and does nicely for this purpose. The baseboard is laid off and drilled according to the following diagram.

The holes for the binding posts are located in the rear edge so the battery connections will be out of the way.

Dimensions—16 inches long, seven inches wide and five-eighths inch thick. There are two holes which cannot be drilled until we are ready to mount the inductance.

The baseboard should be shellacked after being stained the desired color. It is extremely simple to make this board and no difficulty should be experienced by our readers.

The baseboard and coils are now finished, and in the next issue we will continue with the laying out of the panel and general assembly of the set.

Questions and Answers

What kind of battery do you use on the radio outfit which was described in September COMFORT?
P. C., Taylorville, Ill.

A.—No battery is required for this outfit. A galena crystal is used for a detector. Yes, the V. C. you mention is large enough.

How many meters will the outfit in September COMFORT receive?
V. H., Ringgold, La.

A.—The set in September issue of COMFORT will reach approximately 800 meters.

Please tell me all you can about the crystal detector.
J. D. W., Pink Hill, N. C.

A.—The crystal detector, although very stable, is not sensitive and you cannot expect to hear music over 25 miles except under abnormal conditions. Pittsburg

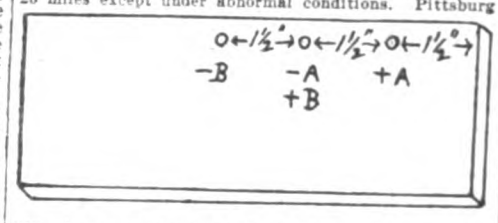

FIG. 4.—BASEBOARD WITH 3 HOLES 1½ INCHES APART AND ½ INCH FROM EDGE OF BOARD.

Station, K. D. K. A., has been heard in Maine on a crystal, and Schenectady is heard often in this State on a good crystal detector.

Can a fixed condenser be used in place of the variable condenser on the set shown in the September issue of COMFORT? Can a bibolar receiver be used on a radio set?
K. F., Orofino, Ida.

A.—A fixed condenser may be used in place of the V. C., but the results will probably be poor.

I am sorry, but I am not familiar with the bibolar receiver and can give you no answer to this question.

Please send me instructions for making a crystal detector radio receiving set. W. S., Emporia, Kans.

A.—This set is described in the September issue of COMFORT.

I want to build my own set, and would be glad to receive your plans for building a set.
R. A. J., Greenlee, Va.

A.—If you will follow the instructions in the November and December issues of COMFORT you will no doubt receive the information you desire.
D. E. T., Ky.

A.—Single circuit is the term used to denote a receiving set which employs a single coil which acts as the primary and secondary also.

What is the most sensitive crystal used for a detector?
L. R., Mo.

A.—Galena is probably the most sensitive crystal, although some find silicon and carborundum very good.

What causes a receiving set to receive music loud when your hands are on the dials, but fade out when they are removed?
J. E. D., Tenn.

A.—This is due to the capacity of your body, and may be remedied by placing a sheet of copper or tin foil on the back of the panel and connecting the foil to the ground lead.

What is the difference between radio frequency amplification and audio frequency amplification?
M. D. L., N. J.

A.—Radio frequency amplification is that which takes place before the incoming wave is rectified and is still vibrating at radio frequency, while audio frequency amplification is that which takes place after the incoming current is rectified and is vibrating at audio frequency.

What staton has the call 5 GY?
M. G., Okla.

A.—5 GY is located at Fort Worth, Texas.

Is it possible to use dry batteries on audion tubes?
C. T., Ind.

A.—Yes, but they will last only a short time on the ordinary tube. There is a special tube, however, which is made especially to use a single dry cell and may be bought from any radio dealer for about $8. The commercial name of the tube is W-D 11.

Is it possible to use the electric light socket for an aerial?
E. C., Penn.

A.—Yes. A special plug is made for this purpose and it is very satisfactory.

Is it true that radio may be received in a submarine while it is under water?
J. N., Del.

A.—Yes. It is true and the government station at Arlington has made some very successful experiments with the submarines at various depths.

In broadcasting the Sunday services, is the sending apparatus located in the church?
P. L. D., Mich.

A.—No. The microphone only. The apparatus is located in the regular station.

Comfort's League of Cousins

DEAR UNCLE LISHA: GREASON, PENN.

I have been watching with a great deal of interest the letters in COMFORT on the powder and paint question. It is a pleasure to note the sturdy statement of existing facts by the boys and the sarcastic answers (if I may so name them) from the girls. However, I hope that just because you noticed I am from the same state as the leader of the opposition, you will not presuppose my being on the same side. This is not the case, because I am now going to issue my proclamation of neutrality and give my reasons for so doing.

First, if anyone has been moved by the finding that his hands still smell of perfume, that his coat has the appearance of having seen a snowstorm, and that his French mustache has turned red after a night of courting—I will say that my occupation does not require that I get so close. As for the perfume, I prefer it to the smell of cigarettes—which I do not think so many girls use as are reputed to use.

Secondly, if anyone is afraid of being deceived by the complexion of his intended, I would advise that he take her for a swim.

Lastly, I believe that he who is without sin should cast the first stone. I used to spend time regretting the fact that I was different from all others, but now I believe we are all very much alike. I am not insensible to the fact that for every folly I find in some other I have one to combat in myself. All are moved by the same aims, desires and follies to a greater or lesser degree. Each one chooses his favorite phantom. These are my reasons. Do they justify themselves to you?

Uncle, I wonder if what interests me would interest you? Would you believe that my favorite pastime is studying languages, history and literature? The only reason I can give for my liking is that these subjects mean more to me than any other subject. Every word in any language tells of a step toward civilization. Words were never made till they were needed. Especially am I interested in my mother tongue, one of the most beautiful of existing languages, how many of us sin against her by using either unlessly or purposely bad English. I am hoping I may some day write and speak without any fear of English.

History reveals to me the circumstances attending the steps in civilization named by the words of the guage. It teaches me to look even back as far as the cave dweller and be thankful for what comforts he gives. To a nation, it is like a surveyor's mark to a uninhabited land. Shadowed warnings of the past, a warning finger to the present and future. History more than a record of past events, it is a living story of why we are what we are.

Literature tells us what men feel and think. Looking deep into the human brain you will find the key man determined by his feelings. At present I am contrasting the essays on Friendship by Emerson and Thoreau. Which one do you think is the better? They are very different, yet I cannot say that I view friendship in the same light as either. I believe that friendship is different to each of us. Most of us agree that it is something more solemn than mere acquaintance. I guess I have said enough about friendship, but stories and poems full of feeling are the kinds of literature I like best.

With permission, I will introduce myself to you and the cousins. Possibly introduction comes before conversation, but, if it does, pardon my rudeness. If this does not devour this letter I shall be teaching school by the time it is published. Thus, from the school house of Penn's woods, you must know that I am somewhat over eighteen—and I will add that I am somewhat under twenty-five. I am five feet and nine inches tall, I have black hair, but I cannot determine from it what species of ape I am indebted. I have brown eyes, but this is farther from the solution because all the apes I ever saw had black. Can you find my family from the description?

If any of the cousins will write to me, I will take time enough from my reading to try writing. It may be that I will enjoy it the better.

Yours truly, PAUL FINEE.

On the Great Paint and Powder Question, Paul, that swimming test of yours is a good enough suggestion—but suppose the girl in the case doesn't happen to swim? The doubting swain might fling his beautifully-complexioned beloved into the creek or millpond—and she could go down like a stone! There might be left behind only a light fragrance of perfumed lipstick and a skim of pale talcum or "rouge vinaigre" on the rippled surface of the water. Paul, I can't endorse this cruel test of yours; there might be too many casualties. You force me to say, better a live niece with a powdered nose, than a drippy damsel carried to the coroner.

Aside from this, Paul, your good letter contained many things I like and believe, and it strikes me that I have a pretty wise young nephew down in some neck of Penn's Woods. Stick to your study of men and books, Paul, being careful not to make too much of a fetish of acquired knowledge and to judge all things by life itself as it is unrolled to you by the years and underlined by experience. A man should be able to stand before the open pages of any book as its master. Its message is to be true only as it is true to him.

I agree with you on the importance of English. It is the tool by which you will handle all other studies. Its mastery will give you expression for your thoughts. It will always open to you new doors of books and men. Pedagogues tell us that English is the most difficult of studies to teach. I rather think that it is too little taught and is displaced for far less necessary subjects. There is too much of a feeling that the use of our mother tongue is something that "comes by nature." And so we can watch and sadly see how the tongue of Shakespeare and the King James Version falls from the lips of University products—and even university professors. By the way, read and re-read the Bible, Paul. All great masters of the written word have always had this book at their finger ends. Have you ever noticed how biblical quotation and expression creep constantly out in Kipling? As a fount of poetry, the greatest and most perfect of poetry, the English Bible stands unexcelled.

seen the river from a good many angles. My, but the pile of ice does look thick when you get up here and the grotto is very fine.

Albert Heim-Hutte—August 9th

We stopped here on way through the Pass en route for Andamatt. It was bright sunshine above but down here all fog. Could see the clouds hanging low as we came along and it looked fine; then as we went a little lower down we went under the clouds. They do not look so pretty when viewed from below as they did coming down on them, but pretty soon the sun breaks through and the fog is all absorbed by the sun, and we have it clear below and above.

Andamatt—August 9th

I found Andamatt one of the most interesting old places that I visited while on this motor bus trip. It is the nearest town to the Matterhorn. It is a great place for natural ski jumps and sports, but it is as a frontier gate to Switzerland that it is most noted. Nature has made it almost impregnable but a fort built into the precipices houses some Swiss troops.

It is said that the German forces did not like the idea of attempting to force this position as a way of getting through Switzerland to turn the flank of the Allies.

Andamatt contains the famous Devil's Bridge of which there are many traditions, one of which says that the devil built the structure. A big lake once existed where Andamatt now stands, but in the year 1113 it broke through the granite and ran away, leaving a level place where the town was built, 4,500 feet above sea level.

The waters rush through the gorge at a furious rate and as a safety measure some of it is carried off through a tunnel.

The Devil's Bridge was the scene of an unsuccessful attempt at invasion by the Russian many years ago.

A statue of Rosseau and a figure of the devil are cut in the rocks nearby, on opposite sides of the bridge.

St. Moritz—August 10th

Guess I have struck the peak of perfection in mountain resorts, for not only has it nearly half a mile more altitude than Wengen, it being situated on the highest plateau in Switzerland, the Engadine Valley with a lake alongside, all being over 6,000 feet above sea level.

Wengen is only 4,000. So after traveling nearly the entire length and breadth of this great Alpine country, seeing it by aeroplane, captive balloon, steamer, railroad, electric and cog-wheel train, motor bus, automobile, horse carriage and on foot, I think in St. Moritz we have the king of all the bunch for beauty and everything—golf as well, while others have only tennis. Although its highest peaks rise only 10,000 feet against Wengen's Young Frau of 14,000 feet, the natural situation of the surroundings and the addition of lake and baths make it at once the finest resort in all Switzerland.

Here we can play golf as well as tennis and enjoy all winter sports, and more than is offered at the other resorts, so with the natural location of the town so far above the others, it is surely the one choice bit to select for winter activities.

So dear St. Moritz, in the Engadine,
You are the choicest gem I yet have seen.
'Neath Summer skies so fresh, so green,
And of Winter sports are surely queen.

To be continued in January number, in which Mr. Gannett will tell of his visits to the battlefields and devastated regions of France and Belgium, Strasbourg and the lost province regained by France from Germany, and queer things he saw from a monoplane in Holland and on his return flight to London.

Forty-Mile Trap-Line

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CHAPTER IV.

THE snowslide which came down and filled the hollow nearly annihilated the two trappers for fair. Had they been less alert to impending danger or only a few seconds slower in acting, the tons of debris surely would have caught and crushed them. Every spring trappers and prospectors in the high mountain countries are accustomed to finding skeletons of various animals that have been overtaken by the terrible snowslides.

Lon had barely reached the protection of a rock ledge, when the roar and spray of the slide deadened all sound and sight of his companion. Above the terrific howl of the snowslide, Lon thought he heard a cry, but at the moment had no time to look and a few seconds later a mountain of packed snow and logs covered the spot where they had been eating their lunch.

Even before the snowslide had quite settled, Lon was clawing his way over the ridges of snow to get to the spot where he had last seen his partner, Tubs. As he ran, Lon sensed with misgivings the solidity of the packed snow. Nothing could lie for any length of time and live under this huge mass of plunder. The trapper rushed all the faster, until he stood over the spot where his partner was last seen, then he grabbed a pole and started digging away. The pole loosened up the snow but was a poor tool for shoveling it out of the way, so Lon jerked off a snowshoe and used it furiously as a shovel. When down almost out of sight, he came to a large log lying crosswise of the ravine; in a few minutes he dropped through for a distance of perhaps two feet.

"Hey, that's no way to come in, feet first," greeted Tubs, seemingly unhurt, but still "pale around the gills," as Lon afterwards expressed it.

The junior trapper had fallen between two large boulders, and the log settling across them had held up the tons of smaller objects. Tubs had room enough to wiggle around during his short period of interment, and had begun to devise a means of escape. He had been cautious enough not to do any digging without first feeling around the dark vacuum for fear a mass of snow and stones would cave in on him. When Lon dropped through on one snowshoe, bringing daylight with him, Tubs was about the most tickled trapper that had ever bent steel.

"That was a close call, Buddy," said Tubs, "let's get out of here before another mountain peak rolls down on us."

"I'm with you, Tubby. Guess we've set enough traps for today."

On the way down the mountainside the boys ran into a fisher's trail, apparently freshly made. Like all professional trappers, Lon stopped and closely examined the trail. Perhaps to a novice like Tubs, the tracks meant little except to indicate the direction in which their owner had been traveling. As it was still a couple of hours of dark, the trappers spent some time looking over the fisher signs. After a few hundred feet of trailing, Lon determined to follow the animal up to its den.

That the fisher's sleeping quarters was close, Lon deducted reasons to believe from the "signs." The animal had walked all the logs in its path—which is a habit of the pekan—but instead of hopping off and continuing ahead, it had sniffed and clawed around the ends, as if looking for a hollow. A small rocky bluff had been circled and the zigzagging trail indicated that the maker had been looking for porcupine dens. Lon circled the bluff to save the time of following the intricate loops of the trail, and soon crossed the trail again. The fisher had next completely circled a dead snag, but still the trail led on through the mixed green timber and hardwood. Now there was no doubt about the fisher's purpose.

"There's a forty-dollar pelt waiting for us, Tubs. All we have to do is to trail it up. Can't be more'n a mile from here; maybe a few hundred yards. Dark may catch us, but I'm in favor of getting that skin, even if we have to lie out over night. I have my safety box of matches and a little jerky, so we will neither freeze nor starve."

"I'm with you," rejoined Tubs.

The trappers tightened their belts and increased their pace. Lon, who was in the lead, looked to the loading of his carbine and kept an eye ahead on the trail, in readiness for a quick shot, should the fisher be seen. He greatly preferred a chance shot at the running animal to later finding the pekan safely holed in a rock den. Of course, he might try smoking it out, and if this method failed, he could resort to setting traps, but this animal is too cunning for either of these ways to insure capture. Lon, who was really a crack shot with the rifle, expressed a preference of "lining his sights on the varmint."

While the fur hunters did not come within sight of the fisher, they were lucky enough to find that its trail ended in a tangled windfall. Lon circled ahead and failed to find the tracks leaving the log jam, so a search was started by following the trail closely. Now the trail circled and criscrossed so that it was difficult to tell whether the fisher had been coming or going. But Lon had trailed more than one fisher, and he invariably untangled all the "doubles" with little loss of time. The end of the trail was reached at a hollow log.

"Isn't this luck," exclaimed Lon, "nothing to do but chop him out."

Already it was getting dusk, and the boys hustled around, highly elated with their good fortune, but none the less alert to prevent the animal escaping. First a switch was poked into the log, and a snarl indicated the location of the fisher; then the ends of the log were plugged with chunks of wood. The work of chopping the fisher out was only a matter of ten or fifteen minutes. To obviate escape, as soon as the animal's head became visible through the newly chopped hole, Tubs was permitted to try his .22 pistol, which mercifully ended the career of a perfectly furred pekan.

The boys had turned to back-track themselves, when Tubs uttered an exclamation that might have done justice to a scalped Indian.

Quickly Lon whirled on his feet, gun in readiness, and the two trappers opened fire simultaneously on a large black bear which had approached within gunshot range.

There was no chance for the bear and it had dropped at Lon's second shot. Tubs kept firing, as fast as he could work the lever of his gun, evidently not aware that the bear was not only dead but had actually rolled out of sight into a hollow.

"Say, what're you shooting at, Tubs?" This isn't the Fourth of July nor your birthday, neither," stormed the cool-headed Lon.

"Oh, so we've already killed the bear," laconically replied Tubs.

The woods now rang with whoops and yells of the trappers. A bear was indeed big game, especially so late in the season. Its fur would be prime and valuable. Ordinarily this hibernating animal would have been denned up, and to satisfy woodsman's curiosity, Lon back-tracked the animal the following day to its den in a rock bluff over which the snowslide had passed. Evidently the bear had decided it was healthier to den in the lowlands, but of course it had no way of anticipating the menace of armed humans in the winter woods. The luck of favorable wind had been against it.

"Some adventures for one day, I'll say," said Lon. "Now for the hard work. Did you ever try to skin a bear in the dark—but of course you never. Here's a candle. I always carry a short one when in the woods. It won't take so long to rip the hide off while the carcass is warm. If it should freeze, we might as well leave it here till spring."

Luckily the boys were only about a mile from their toboggan trail, and the candle lasted them until it was reached. It was no trouble to keep in the hard-packed toboggan road, and two tired but happy boys came staggering up to their camp late in the evening loaded down with a fisher and a heavy bearskin. During the return trip, Tubs had spoken little for when the bearskin had been taken off no marks were found to indicate that he had put in a single effective shot. One hole back of the shoulder, such as a soft-point bullet from Lon's gun would have made, seemed to have been the telling shot.

Fur trapping and hunting was now in full swing. The blizzard and cold weather had primed up all kinds of furs sought after by the boys, and the traps required the combined attention of the two, working from daylight until dark. The frequent snowfalls necessitated moving up the traps often. The snow interfered greatly with trail sets, but as foxes, for which the trail sets were particularly intended, did not travel much during cold weather, these sets were neglected in favor of cubbies and under-ice sets.

During the early days of the season, Tubs made some large catches of muskrats, mink and raccoon, but as the season advanced, the raccoon denned up, and the mink and muskrat traveled most of the time under the ice of the streams and ponds. Winter trapping in the woods was something new to Tubs, so he soon abandoned his trap-line and pulled most of the traps, intending to follow and help the experienced Lon with his long lines. In this way he would acquire in a few weeks the knowledge of trapping lore and woodcraft that had required years of personal experience to learn.

"We start at daylight, old top, which means we get up at an hour of dawn to cook some of this bear meat. By the time you get your hide around a pound of bear steak, you may be able to keep up with me. Better stick a bunch of raisins and some sweet chocolate in your pockets, too, along with a chunk of bear meat. I never stop to cook a meal while on the trap-line; usually I halt only long enough to 'boil the kettle'."—make tea, in trappers' parlance.

If the reader will follow closely the narrative of the day's trip over the trap-line, he will learn almost as much about trapping ways as did Tubs who followed in Lon's snowshoe trail. There were not any traps set for fur animals within a mile of the camp, except a few muskrat and rabbit traps. The muskrat traps were not visited, as any animals caught would be drowned in the stream and remain safely until a convenient time to remove them. The rabbit traps were set not far off the trail and these were visited and the captured rabbits killed and taken along in the packsacks to be used as bait. When enough were taken for bait, the rest were hung up in the evergreens to be taken to camp later.

"Now, Tubs, from here on little talking, remember. We're getting into the fur country and are apt to get a shot at game or a fur bearer any time. Most important of all, a trapped animal begins to struggle fiercely in the trap when it hears the trapper coming, and often if they have time enough this last superb effort will effect their escape. I always slip up to a trap quietly, if I expect game in it, and should the animal escape then, I stand some chance of shooting it. This was the law laid down by the senior trapper, and thereafter until the boys arrived back to camp conversation was limited to the sign language and chats while eating lunch or traveling in the clearings.

Forty-Mile Trap-Line

"Hear that chain jingling, Tubs? That's music to my ears, for I happen to remember it was a trail set for fox. The light snow late yesterday evidently covered the trap and human sign and scent properly. Fox trapping in the snow depends mostly on the luck you have with the weather."

The trappers came within sight of the trap and found that it held a large, prime red fox. The chain had a grapple on the end, which had hung up close to the set. Lon approached quietly and tapped the fox smartly across the head with a walking stick he always carried on the trap-line. He purposely aimed the blow just light enough not to draw blood, for the set would then be ruined. The trap, a No. 3, was reset and with a balsam bough Lon lightly brushed dry snow over it, then brushed out his own tracks as he backed away. The trap was setting in a narrow trail between two evergreens which Lon had learned early in the season to be a regular fox run.

Three hundred yards down the trail the fox fur was peeled off and the carcass hung up in a bush for fisher bait. Directly under the bait Lon set a No. 3 jump trap.

"Just the kind of set for a fool cat (Canadian lynx) and I've caught fisher this way," remarked Lon.

The trap-line next traversed a two-mile stretch of barren or burnt-over land where traps were far apart. Lon had recognized one runway at right angles to his trail and placed several traps in it. The traps were No. 3 jumps and wool was stuffed under the pans to prevent rabbits springing them. One of these traps held another red fox.

Further time was lost on the burnt-over land by following a bobcat's winding trail. After an hour's trailing, in the hope that the animal would be found denned or the trail merge into a regular runway, Lon declared the cat didn't know where it was going, noway, so they didn't set a trap.

The trail now led into a swamp where rabbit trails were without end, and in each trail appeared lynx tracks. Lon was disappointed in not catching one of these valuable and scarce fur bearers—awkward and timid when in a trap, but ready to scrap at the approach of the trapper.

In the swamp were numerous springs and these afforded excellent places to trap mink and raccoon. Lon reckoned he had about a dozen sets in the swamp springs, some of them for fox. Some of the sets were hard to find, in spite of the fact they were marked by three blazes on the nearest tree. The results of the swamp sets were two mink and an undersized 'coon. These had been taken in blind sets where tracks had been numerous.

Down at the lower end of the swamp, the water was draining off in sufficient quantity to form a small brook. Lon had carefully prospected this outlet for a place where one trap would effectively guard it for any animal passing up or down stream. That he had been successful was soon proven to the satisfaction of both trappers. While a considerable distance away, Lon spotted the water-and-mud marked snowbank.

"Holy Mackinaws! Tubs, that's a lot of sign for a mink to make," exclaimed Lon aloud, who now changed his gait into a lope, so impatient was he to learn what rare game was now trapped. The trap chain extended its full length out into deep water and Lon began to pull it in with trembling hands. It pulled hard, as if attached to a log, and then the head of an animal appeared, the like of which Tubs had never before seen.

"Ah, whoopee! By the great medicine, here's real luck. A rare otter, the travelingest bird that wears fur and catches trout. What do you think of that, Tubs? Worth at least thirty dollars." Lon was all excitement and held up the slim and finely furred animal admiringly.

"Guess this is some lucky catch for one day, even if the line hasn't been visited for a week," replied Tubs.

The younger trapper now got the job of carrying the otter, for this animal is so difficult to skin that most trappers prefer to take them to camp where a careful and unhurried skinning may be performed.

The otter brought a change of luck, for not another animal of any value was taken that day. Several new sets were made along the streams where mink and raccoon had been wading in search of crawfish, cubby pens baited with fish were conveniently established along the banks near crossing places or at the mouths of brooks. Back on the mountain line, en route to camp, the boys found a deer carcass that was being eaten by what appeared to be a whole colony of marten; but Lon soon explained that a pair of marten will make tracks enough in one night to afford a toboggan trail. Anyway, here were at least a few pairs of these valuable and easily trapped animals, and most of the afternoon was taken up in setting traps in the trails.

When Tubs and Lon reached camp at dark, the former declared he would never be able to crawl out of the bunk on the morrow, the trappers having covered about fifteen miles besides trap setting, most of the time carrying considerable loads. The next day, fortunately for the less calloused trapper, was extremely stormy and the trappers stayed indoors, making boards and stretching their furs.

The days that followed during the month of December were hard ones for the trappers. The thermometer hung around thirty below much of the time. The country was new, the trap-line far back off the beaten paths of hunters and village trappers, and the boys profited greatly by their energetic methods. Tubs worked several pounds of his superfluous flesh into hard-as-pig-iron muscle and both made enough money to exceed the best wages paid "outside." Besides a substantial catch of raccoon, mink, fox, muskrat, a few each of marten, fisher and otter, just a few days before pulling the last traps preparatory to going out for Christmas holidays, a rare cross-fox was taken in one of Tubs' self-set traps. The pelt brought $75 when shipped.

The weather got so cold, most fur bearers hibernated or lived under ice, and the trap-line catch fell off fast, so a week before Christmas the boys pulled and cached their traps under rock ledges and tacked up a sign on the cabin door, reading:

"This cabin belongs to Lon Baker and Tubs Johnson, fur trappers, who have gone out to Racquette Lake village to sell their furs. Everybody welcome, but leave what you find. Salt sack hanging from the rafter out of porky's reach; matches in the Dutch oven. Shut the door when you leave. Thank you!"

Thus ends the first trapping expedition of Tubs Johnson and Lon Baker, fur trappers of the Adirondacks.

Industrial Gas Uses Increasing Rapidly

The use of manufactured gas in industrial plants is increasing rapidly in the great manufacturing centers of the country. It is supplanting other fuels in many processes where an easily controlled and intense heat is needed.

Some of the reasons for the increased use of gas in industry are:

An assurance of a continuous supply of fuel, because if the flow of fuel stops, production must stop.

A fuel which is uniform in quality.

Gas is a flexible fuel which is easily controlled and the amount of heat necessary to various manufacturing processes readily adjusted.

Heat is easily applied to work, as it is not necessary to go through numerous mechanical operations to make the heat available as with other fuels.

The cost is reasonable.

The gas is always available by the twist of a wrist.

It is not necessary to provide storage space for fuel or to have a large amount of capital tied up in fuel stocks.

There is no expense of ash or waste removal and no worry about transportation delays or car shortages and there is no freight to pay.

It does not have to be paid for until used. There is no interest charge on the coal pile.

When Government Runs the Switchboard

Public ownership of a utility causes some wry faces in England, when the British telephone system, run by the Post Office, is contemplated. It happened that England received in the same week the report of an official committee which had been seeking the reason why the British telephone system is not a success and the reports of the telephone system of the United States for the previous year.

In the United States the 26 large associated private companies and the 9,000 and more independent concerns made a showing of efficiency that is unknown in England, where both the telephone and the telegraph are heavy charges upon the public purse.

"The telephone system in America," one British comment runs, "is as different from what we know here under the same name as an article in general use is different from a rare and expensive luxury. In this country very few people not actually engaged in business use the telephone at all. In the United States, even in rural districts, it is quite common to find the telephone installed under conditions which in this country would seem to preclude the possibility of having such a convenience."—The Nation's Business.

The Best Cough Syrup is Home-made

Here's an easy way to save $2, and yet have the best cough remedy you ever tried.

You've probably heard of this well-known plan of making cough syrup at home. But have you ever used it? Thousands of families, the country over, feel that they could hardly keep house without it. It's simple and cheap, but the way it takes hold of a cough will soon earn it a permanent place in your home.

Into a pint bottle, pour 2½ ounces of Pinex, then add plain granulated sugar syrup to fill up the pint. Or, if desired, use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, it tastes good, never spoils, and gives you a full pint of better cough remedy than you could buy ready-made for three times its cost.

It is really wonderful how quickly this home-made remedy conquers a cough—usually in a few hours or less. It seems to penetrate through every air passage, loosens a dry, hoarse or tight cough, lifts the phlegm, heals the membranes, and gives almost immediate relief. Splendid for throat tickle, hoarseness, croup, bronchitis and bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, and has been used for generations for throat and chest ailments.

To avoid disappointment ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Dimming Headlights

OWNERS of Ford cars which use magneto generated current for headlights have undoubtedly many times desired an arrangement which would make possible the dimming of the lights without necessitating the reducing of ıe motor to almost an idling speed. While there ːe dimming sockets and resistance units which ın be purchased for this purpose, the owner can, he should so desire, make and install a device hich will serve the purpose well and incur but small outlay of money. The resistance unit hich cuts down the amount of current to the ımps is a piece of hard lead cut away from an rdinary hard lead pencil. A piece of about one nd one-half inches in length is about right but ne owner can best determine the proper length ɔ use by trying leads of different lengths. Two rackets are constructed of sheet brass between hich the piece of lead is held. A switch and a ew lengths of cable complete the outfit. The ccompanying diagram shows the manner in which he outfit should be installed. It will be noted hat turning the switch to the position marked A" in the sketch sends the current directly to he lamps without going through the dimming nit. The lights of course burn brightly when switched in this position Turning the switch to position "B" sends the current through the unit and cuts it down so that the lights are dim even when the engine is running at fairly high rate of speed.

Gasolene-Oil Mixture

Manufacturers warn owners of new cars to drive at moderate rates of speeds for the first 500 to 1,000 miles so as to give the bearings a chance to ease and polish. It is a timely warning and one which should be strictly heeded. I am acquainted with a large car and truck distributor who for several years has made it a practice to drive cars overland from the factory to his place of business, a distance of about 600 miles. It has been his custom to pour into the gasolene tank one pint of oil to every five gallons of gasolene. The principle is that a small amount of cylinder oil will be sprayed through the carburetor up into the cylinders. This affords additional lubricant for the pistons and is good insurance against a scratched cylinder should the piston rings be a trifle tight.

Helpful Pointers

Engine Refuses to Stop

Due to a lean mixture, it sometimes happens that the motor continues to run after the ignition switch is turned off. An easy way to stop it is to choke the carburetor or engage a gear and let in the clutch.

Railway Crossings

A driver should, and usually does, slow down when approaching a railway crossing. The danger of stalling the motor on the crossing lies in attempting to pick up speed while still in high gear. After slowing down it is always well to engage the second gear or even the low speed until having passed over the crossing. You are then assured plenty of power with little or no danger of stalling the motor.

Battery Reading

When necessary to test a storage battery, take the hydrometer reading before adding any distilled water. The true condition of a cell cannot be determined immediately after adding the water as charging is necessary for its mixing with the electrolyte.

Leak-Tight Gaskets

Gaskets used for carburetor manifold, water connections and like places, will usually be rendered leak-proof if coated on both sides with hard oil before being drawn up tight.

Getting Out of Ditch

Having recently experienced the misfortune of running one side of my car off a gravel road, due to a fog and the blinding lights from an approaching car, I wish to pass along a suggestion which may prove helpful to other owners. The right side of my car was down the bank about a foot when I brought the machine to a halt. As is usually the case, my tow-line reposed on a nail in the garage. I inquired of the drivers who arrived on the scene and like myself they all seemed to have tow-lines but they were left at home. Necessity being the mother of invention, I dug a track with my hands in the loose gravel so that the right side of the car would have a runway onto the road. Next I persuaded my friends to stand on the left running board or on the side away from the ditch. This I did to keep all the weight possible on the road side. Taking my place behind the wheel, I engaged the low gear and with just enough motor speed to insure power, I gently let in the clutch. Like the conclusion of the movies where all is well, the car gained the road on its own power without digging or sliding further down the bank.

Cold Weather Suggestions

Cold Weather Hard on Battery

Most everyone knows from experience that when a motor is turned over on a cold day, the action is very stiff. When the electric starter is used upon such occasions, additional current is required to perform the work which would have been accomplished on much less current on a warmer day. All this current is taken directly from the storage battery. If the engine does not start readily, continued use of the starter places an enormous drain on the battery. If the battery is not kept up to "fully charged" state, starting with the electric starter on a cold day may be almost an impossibility. The starter may turn the engine over but the failure of the engine to fire is due to all available current going to the starter, leaving none for ignition purposes. If only a little current diverts to the ignition system, the spark may be too weak to fire the mixture in the cylinder. The use of the hand crank after the car has been standing a long time in the cold is good policy as it insures a hot spark and also does not cause a heavy drain on the storage battery.

Winter Battery Storage

If the storage battery is to stand idle it should first be fully charged. About once a month the battery should receive a freshening charge. Unless you are equipped to give the battery a charge from an outside source, I have found it convenient to store it at a garage or battery shop during the winter where equipment is available for recharging.

Care of Top

Do not put the top down if the car is stored for the winter. Leave the top up and the curtains on to prevent their cracking.

Carburetor Air Heater

Most cars are equipped with an arrangement for heating the air taken into the carburetor. Frequently these heaters are fitted with a shutter which should be opened in summer and closed in winter. If you have not already done so, the shutter should be closed so as to direct all air through the heater. If you have been running on a lean mixture during the summer months it will be well to richen the mixture a trifle at this season to assist starting and prevent a lengthy spell of spitting through the carburetor when the motor is first started.

Cold Weather Starting

Difficulty in starting is a common trouble in cold weather. Frequently choking and priming the carburetor will be sufficient to produce a start but there may be times when priming the cylinders with gasolene will be necessary. Some drivers do not understand why a motor refuses to fire after the cylinders have been "primed" with a considerable amount of gasolene. The fact is that when a large amount of gasolene is poured into each cylinder, the cylinder is not primed but flooded. This charge will not fire and must be thinned by opening the relief cocks in the head of the motor and turning the motor over several times with the ignition switch off. The cocks can then be closed and after the ignition is switched on the motor will usually fire. At times an owner will flood the cylinders with gasolene, make several attempts to start the motor and then give up. An hour or so later he will try again and be surprised to find that the motor starts readily. In this case the gasolene has worked past the pistons, leaving just enough in the combustion chambers to form a rich starting mixture. About a teaspoonful of gasolene in each cylinder should be enough for priming.

Warming Gasolene

In the absence of high test gasolene, warm gasolene makes an effective priming agent. Gasolene poured in a squirt can and placed in hot water will quickly rise in temperature. Due to the explosive vapor which will come off of the heated gasolene, it will be safer to place the hot water away from any flames before immersing the squirt can of gasolene.

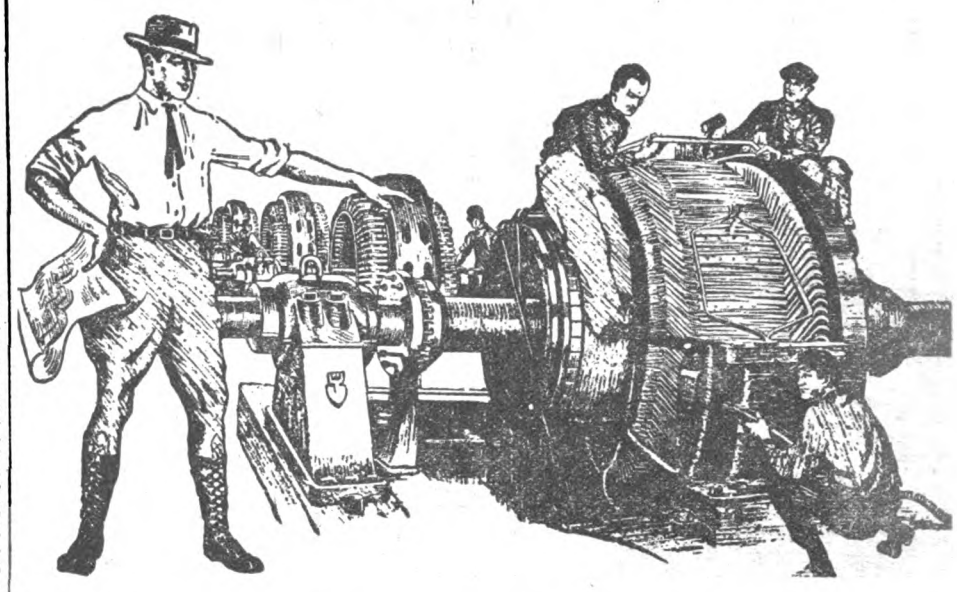
Watch Crankcase Oil.

For reasons which have been several times explained in these columns, gasolene may accumulate in the motor crankcase during the cold weather. A close watch should be kept on oil consumption during this period because, should the motor appear to be using but little oil then an investigation should be made on the assumption that gasolene is replacing the oil in the crankcase. The crankcase should be drained and the old oil caught in a retainer. When contaminated with gasolene, the oil will be thin and usually will put off an odor of kerosene or gasolene. Refill the crankcase with fresh oil. Most manufacturers advise changing the oil in the crankcase about every 500 miles during cold weather. The old oil drained from the crankcase is excellent for spring leaf lubrication.

Answers to Correspondents

BURNT GAS RESIDUE IN CYLINDER.—Have been an interested reader of COMFORT'S "Automobile and Gas Engine Helps" for several years and certainly have received some valuable information therefrom. If not too theoretical, please answer the following question: If it were possible to build a gasolene engine that would force all the burnt gas out of the cylinder on the exhaust stroke and still have a suitable combustion chamber on the compression stroke, would it not be more economical of gasolene than the present-day motor with its seemingly necessary combustion chamber which cannot be entirely cleared of burnt gas?

H. K., Hanover, Ohio.



A.—Theoretically, the exhaust stroke is supposed to sweep the cylinder clean of all burnt gases. However, in practice the four-stroke cycle does not absolutely clean the cylinder and there is a certain portion of the burnt gases in the cylinder when the fresh charge of vapor is admitted. You are correct in the assumption that the engine would be more efficient if the burnt gases were entirely forced out.

POINTS ON BUYING USED CAR.—As we are thinking of purchasing a used car next spring I would like to get some pointers on how to judge the quality of a used car. D. S., Madison, Kansas.

A.—It is a difficult matter to give advice relative to the purchase of a used car. I have purchased a few myself and have got "stung" as well as received bargains. My first suggestion is that you deal with only a reputable concern. By this I mean that you should consider a dealer who has been thoroughly established and who has a reputation for looking after the interests of his customers. In further explanation, I would state that this type of dealer usually considers the purchaser of a used car as a good prospect for a new car at a later date. He will therefore take care that the

December—and "Merry Christmas"

DECEMBER is the "rest month" in the garden. Other things take up our time, for this is the season of Christmas trees, Santa Claus, presents and good cheer.

But has it ever occurred to you that most of us, unintentionally of course, overlook our best friend every holiday season? There are toys and goodies for the kiddies; there are remembrances for Gran'ma and Gran'pa, bless their cheery old hearts; there are presents for the "good wife" and for daughters and sons and good friends of the family. But, speaking of good friends tried and true, why is it that the old farm itself is overlooked? It provides the wherewithal that buys the presents—the presents that are simply the dessert following the full meal of the season's bounty it has so lavishly provided. At this merry time of giving is it right or fair to forget the farm, the place that represents home to us, the hearth around which our happiness for years has centered? How thoughtless we humans are! But once our attention is called to the error of our ways, how promptly and willingly we strive to make amends.

Speaking in all seriousness, why not make the farm a present? Let the whole family contribute toward the gift. Make it something that will be useful, something that will serve for years to lighten the load and the hearts of the farm family. Look at it this way if you wish: When you make a present to your farm it is for all the world like reaching down into the pocket of your jeans and transferring the money to your vest pocket. You eat the cake and still you have it, the old saying to the contrary notwithstanding.

Worthy farm presents are legion; we have space to mention only a few. Let's therefore take a look at the farm as a whole. What single thing would be most welcome? To our way of thinking there is nothing that should take precedence over electricity as a source of farm light and power. Farmers the country over begin and end their days with a lantern in their hands. They perform from four to six hours' work by the dim and questionable light of a smoky lantern, "cuss" the gloom of the cold winter mornings, start the day with a grouch. Without mentioning the fire risk, and the inconvenience, there are dozens of reasons why electric lights are worth while and should not be considered as an impossible luxury.

Then, too, with a power plant there is "juice" right at hand to save elbow grease in countless ways. In the barn there is the fanning mill and the feed grinder; in the machine shop the grindstone, emery wheel, lathe or drill; in the modern dairy the cream separator and perhaps the churn. There may even be the wood saw and the silo filler—but we have said enough along this line. Let's take a look inside the house.

Often on the so-called "improved farm" all the improvements are from the back door of the dwelling house out. The house itself shows little change in the past generation. Is it fair to the "missus" and the girls, life partners in successful farming, that this should be the case? We only state facts when we say that their side of farm improvements is neglected at the expense of happiness, health and prosperity. Is it worth correcting?

Here, then, is a chance to do a good turn for the housewife and for the old farm at one and the same time—to kill two birds with one stone, as it were. A pressure system to provide running water will lighten her work and brighten her long working day. Add to that the convenience of running water at the kitchen sink, the comforts of a well-equipped bathroom, and the joys of an up-to-date laundry. Then there is running water for the barns, the watering trough, for fire protection, for lawn sprinkling and for washing the family automobile when the ambitious boy prepares to go "sparking" the neighbor's daughter.

We could go on and enumerate good presents for the farm, things that would quickly return the first cost in a number of ways of which increased profits would be one. But space does not permit. All we can do is advise that the idea be given serious thought by every reader. Each knows his own needs best; each can best tell how much can be afforded. But remember this: any outlay for a Christmas present for the good old farm is in reality an investment, not an expenditure. How many other presents we buy will stand that test?

"Home-Grown Ice"

In regions where ponds, lakes or rivers are few, a supply of ice for the farm can be "home-grown," provided cold winter weather prevails for a sufficiently long period.

Ice may be made in either metal cans or paper bags. The metal cans may be made in any convenient size by a local tinsmith for a small cost. They should be of galvanized iron reinforced at top and bottom with iron strips. The bottom is made smaller than the top to make the removal of the cake easier. Here is how they are used:

When cold weather is at hand, the cans are placed near the water supply, filled with water, and left exposed to the weather. A shell of ice soon freezes across the top and around the inner surfaces of the can. When the shell is one and one-half to two inches in thickness, pour hot water on the outside of the can to loosen the ice, then carefully invert the can to remove the cake. Chop a small hole in the top of the cake, remove part of the water; the little remaining will quickly freeze. Add more water little by little through the hole in the top until the shell has been filled with ice and a solid block is produced. By operating in this manner, only a few cans are required, and the cost is considerably reduced.

Paraffined paper or light cardboard boxes or bags are handled in just the same way as the galvanized iron cans, but they do not last long and are more difficult to handle, having a tendency to "buckle" and spill their contents. Their cheapness is their greatest recommendation.

Another method of ice making that can be used in the colder sections is to run water into the ice-house and let a layer freeze. This is done by first constructing a dam of snow around the floor of the ice-house 10 or 12 inches from the walls to allow room for sawdust insulation next to the walls. The interior of the house is then flooded with a few inches of water; when this freezes, the process is repeated until the house is filled with ice. It is then covered with sawdust or marsh hay and closed up until ice is needed. One great drawback of this method is that in order to remove ice it must be cut or chopped out with an ax. Uneven and irregular pieces, and considerable waste result. Cakes of uniform shape and size, as those obtained by the tank or paper bag methods, are much more convenient to handle and economical to use.

Drainage Through Wells

Drainage through wells, sometimes called "vertical drainage," is a method of disposing of surface water through wells dug down to a porous soil layer or to an opening in the underlying rock. Occasionally such wells can be used to advantage to dispose of surplus water where outlets into natural water courses or artificial drains or ditches are not possible. Where accumulated water is held in depressions by a layer of tight soil or rock which does not permit the water to pass readily through, and where no surface outlet is practicable, vertical drainage often proves to be a comparatively simple solution of the drainage problem.

Simply stated, vertical drainage consists in providing a channel for passing the water from the surface through impervious soil layers into an underlying reservoir. This reservoir may be formed either by rock openings or by an extensive body of coarse sand or gravel that is capable of taking up large volumes of water. It is only necessary, then, to dig or drill a well down to this natural reservoir and turn the drainage into it, first having taken precautions to prevent the clogging of the well with sediment carried in the water. Clogging may be prevented by lining the well properly and by providing an entrance for water that will exclude trash and sediment.

This sounds quite simple; sometimes it is. The difficulty lies principally in the fact that the existence of the required underground reservoir is the exception rather than the rule. Furthermore, there usually is no way of telling in advance whether such a reservoir exists, or whether its capacity is sufficient to be permanently effective. The only way to find out is to try—and to try means to make an outlay of time, labor and money which either may or may not bring the results desired.

Limestone Areas Favorable

In the limestone areas of the United States, particularly in Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia and Alabama, "sink holes" are more or less common. Frequently drainage of considerable areas takes place naturally through these depressions. Sometimes there may be only a few feet of soil over the rock crevices; sometimes the openings in the rock extend to the surface of the ground. Where such crevices can be reached without great expense they afford good outlets for drainage. As such conditions are more likely to be found in the limestone regions, it is here that we find the best opportunities for vertical drainage.

Drainage wells that depend for their efficiency upon the water absorbing capacity of underground layers will always be more or less uncertain except where experience with nearby wells that the reservoir has the required capacity. Even that the addition of more wells may prove to be an overload that results in the failure of all. Often such wells will give good service for a time, only to fail later due to the limited capacity of the reservoir. Where reservoirs are known to have outlet as springs or into streams or depressions, the probability of their usefulness for drainage purposes is considerably increased.

Of 73 wells in the North Central States examined by engineers of the Department of Agriculture, 42 were reported unsatisfactory, 23 of doubtful value, and eight entirely satisfactory. Many wells had been dug in regions in no respect suited to this method of drainage, which may account in part for the unfavorable showing. Of the properly constructed wells examined in limestone regions, 75 per cent. were successful. Power-drilled, rock-penetrating wells have generally proved more effective than shallow wells, provided that clogging had been successfully prevented.

Using Tobacco Barns for Sweet-Potato Storage

Many farmers who do not raise a large acreage of sweet potatoes feel that the expense of a special building in which to store their crop is not justified by the size of the crop itself. Therefore they depend upon pits, banks, or cellars for storage—and in many instances a large part of the crop is lost. For sweet potato raisers who cannot afford the necessary outlay for a special building, some building already on the farm which serves another important purpose can be remodeled so as to meet both needs, thus assuring safe storage of the sweet potato crop at a very small cash outlay. On farms that have flue-heated tobacco barns or similar buildings that serve their main purpose before the potato harvest, this saving is quite practical.

Farmers' Bulletin 1267, "Utilization of Flue-Heated Tobacco Barns for Sweet Potato Storage," has recently been issued by the United States Department of Agriculture to meet the request of farmers living in sweet potato regions in the tobacco country. The changes needed to convert tobacco barns so that they will serve the double purpose, bill of materials necessary for the remodeling, best methods of storehouse management, and a brief description of a number of varieties of sweet potatoes are all included in the new bulletin which may be obtained free by writing to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Getting Ready for the Holiday Market

EVEN for home consumption it is desirable to fatten, kill and dress poultry knowledgeably. It makes such a difference to nutriment and flavor.

Fattening, as understood in France and some parts of England, is a semi-artificial process. Birds—capons and turkeys, principally—are confined in individual coops and fed heavily on moderately soft mash for two weeks, by which time the appetite commences to fail and stuffing is resorted to. A funnel-like appliance is inserted in the bird's mouth and pushed down into its throat; then a liquid food is poured into the bird's crop until it is filled. The very large commercial establishments use an apparatus which looks something like a street knife grinder's machine, and is worked in the same way by the attendant's foot, only instead of turning the wheel the treadle action controls a pump which forces the feed out of a tank down a tube into the bird's crop. Both excellent methods, possibly, but after seeing them in operation, I confessed to preferring a little more humane and wholesomely old-fashioned way of providing delicacies for our table.

We have coops six feet long by two and a half wide, with yards six by ten, into which ten birds are placed three weeks before killing. Fowls of a year old when properly prepared make good roasters; taken from the general yard, they are tough and fit only for soup. Cockerels of ten or twelve weeks old will, by special fattening and inactivity, become plump very quickly. The roost in a coop is only a foot from the floor; yard and floor of coop are of firmly trampled earth, with no loose gravel, sand, or scratching material of any description, the object being to keep the birds as placid as possible.

Morning, noon and night mash is fed, as it is more easily digested and assimilated than whole corn. The first ten days the mash consists of one quart of ground feed, one-third of a teaspoon of salt, one pint of boiled and mashed carrots, potatoes, or beets, mixed and moistened with skim-milk. Last ten days, one quart of corn meal, one dessertspoonful of powdered charcoal, one pound of potatoes, and two onions, boiled and mashed. Mix all together and make quite soft with skim-milk in which beef suet has been boiled. Suet is only about six cents a pound. Half a pound chopped fine is sufficient for two quarts of milk. Simmer for fifteen minutes. Feed in V-shaped troughs as much as the birds will eat up in fifteen minutes. It must not be allowed to stand before them continually, or they will become satiated. It was an old Frenchman who gave this hint about suet, which is excellent, making the flesh deliciously tender and juicy.

The effect of food on cavor has been set forth as most important in the New York Market Journal. They call poultrymen's attention to the fact that the exquisite flavor of the canvasback duck is due to the wild celery it feeds upon. The delicious Congo chickens owe their superior excellence to the pineapples they eat. The grouse meat of the far Western plains is aromatic with the wild sage.

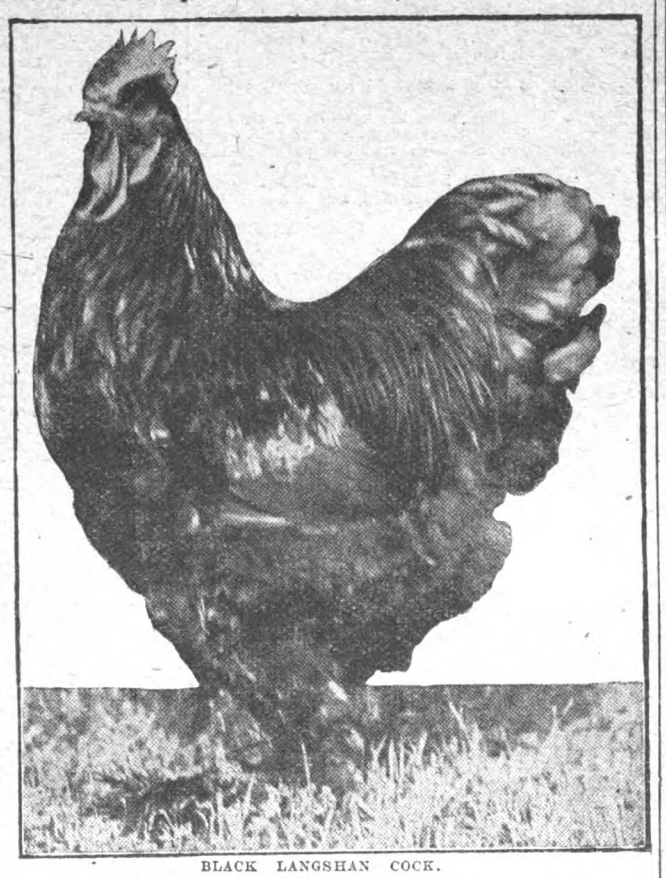
The feeding for more weight or size will, in the near future, give place to the higher art of gratifying the palate. The capon now ranks high above ordinary poultry without any special methods of feeding. How much greater must its superiority be when fed for flavor as well as tenderness and size. Now and then some enthusiastic thoroughbred raiser will descant on the merits of his favorite breed—"their tender, juicy flesh, and rich, highly-flavored eggs, not to be compared to the 'dunghills long ago discarded'"—forgetting that the "dunghills" were truly named, and that from hard scratching in the barnyard for a living resulted the small, tough bodies and ill-flavored eggs complained of. His thoroughbreds have a yard to themselves, are fed on the choicest grains and grasses, and have only pure water to drink. Feeding for flavor must sooner or later become a generally acknowledged part of poultry culture.

After the fattening has been successfully accomplished, correct killing and dressing must follow to insure excellence. Twenty-four hours before killing, birds are removed to individual coops a foot and a half square, with wire netting sides, floors of slats half an inch apart, and legs two feet high. The open flooring and elevated position allow the droppings to fall through and out of the bird's reach. For twelve hours they have milk before them all the time, but no food. Last twelve hours, nothing but water, to insure crop being empty.

The most humane and best way of slaughtering the poor things is to have a string with a noose at one end suspended from a beam in some outhouse. Slip the feet through the noose. Instruct the operator to stand with his back to the bird; take the body under his left arm, breast uppermost; the head in the left hand. Open the beak by pressing at the sides between the thumb and finger, and with a French killing knife stab up into the extreme back of the roof of the mouth. Give a quick turn to the left and withdraw the knife. Leave the bird suspended for a few minutes before taking the feet from the noose.

Plucking must be done at once. Commence with the long wing and tail feathers; then from the shanks, down the inside of the thigh, and over the breast to the neck. Take only a few feathers at a time; grasp as closely to the skin as possible, and pull quickly toward the head. At first it may be difficult to remove the feathers without tearing the skin, but a little assurance and some practice will render it quite easy. After the feathers, all pin-feathers or quills have to be extracted. Then hang the bird up to become quite cold before drawing, but don't delay more than two hours.

Cut off the head with a sharp knife, leaving about three inches of the neck, slit the skin at the back lengthwise, push back, and cut out the neck bone close to the body. With the point of the knife sever the membrane which holds the windpipe to the breast, cut off the shanks, make a straight cut from the end of the breastbone, being careful to sever the skinny flesh only. Continue to cut in a circle around the vent, and the bird can be drawn without any unseemly exposure or soiling of the flesh.



Place a peeled onion or a piece of charcoal in the body, and hang up in a cold cellar for twenty-four hours. Following the above method of drawing leaves the bird unmarred; and the neck skin, being folded under the back after the stuffing has been put in, holds it firmly in place for roasting and carving. The few stitches necessary from the breastbone down do not show when the bird is trussed. The gizzard and liver must be carefully severed from the remaining parts to avoid breaking the gall bag, which is a small sac lying between the two parts of the liver. Hold the gizzard with the narrow, smooth line that runs on one side uppermost. Lay the edge of the knife on the line, and make a small, shallow cut, which will reveal a gray-colored inner bag that is to be removed intact, hence the necessity for the cut being shallow.

It has not yet become the general market custom in this country to draw and truss birds at once, but private customers will quickly appreciate the improvement in flavor that immediate attention to cleanliness makes, and before long I believe that the present custom of keeping and shipping undrawn birds will be condemned by the health authorities. When birds are going to customers, instead of being sent in a sprawling condition, they are trussed as for roasting, leaving a piece of charcoal inside to insure perfect sweetness.

The approach of Christmas makes every housewife and mother long for extra money to spend on presents and good things for the family table. Town and city women have to scrimp and scrimp for months to gratify such desires, but the country woman, with her poultry and other farm products, can easily earn the wherewithal for gifts and good cheer, as well as yearly income, by taking advantage of the parcel post to bring her in touch with private customers. On every farm there is some product which the city dweller would be glad to have direct from the country, and now, when the rural delivery picks parcels up right at the gate, a woman can ship from a comb of honey to a quart of berries, a dozen eggs or a fifty-pound box of vegetables, without waiting for the men folks to hitch up and take them to the express office, which used to be one of the greatest obstacles to small orders, even when customers were willing to pay the heavy charges made on small packages by express companies.

How to find such customers is usually a puzzle, unless one has city friends who can be bribed into doing a little dilettante canvassing. Failing any such friendly agency, more commercial methods must be employed. A personal letter to a few doctors in good localities, stating that the writer was making a specialty of strictly new laid, sterilized eggs for invalids, for ladies and children, would be likely to bring results.

A city telephone book or business directory will furnish the names and addresses of private hospitals and sanitariums, and also of trained nurses.

BLACK LANGSHAN COCK.

By return mail she received an order for half a dozen three times a week, and another order for a dozen a week. Within ten days three more orders had been received, one for a dozen a week, one for six twice a week, and another for a dozen a week.

Gradually she acquired a large clientele of customers; and in many cases where illness brought fresh orders for eggs, the family became regular customers for table eggs, and fresh vegetables and fruit when in season. In time they added squab broilers, chicken and currant jelly to their specials for invalids, and are now clearing from fifteen to twenty dollars a week.

There are several firms making corrugated paper boxes and cases specially made for shipping eggs, berries, vegetables and dressed poultry through the parcel post, and as they are all constructed on the collapsible plan, they can be returned by the customer and used over and over again, which minimizes the cost, which seems heavy until that fact is considered.

The egg boxes which hold one dozen cost $2.30 for fifty. Two dozen size, $3.00 for fifty. The vegetable boxes also come in two sizes—15x9 and 14x13 inches, and cost respectively $2 and $2.50 for twenty-five. Postage on a dozen eggs is six cents within the first and second zones, which means within one hundred and fifty miles of the shipping point. Two dozen cost only an extra cent. The first sized vegetable box, when filled, usually weighs about eight pounds, on which the postage would be twelve cents.

The most satisfactory method is to have a fixed price, which will cover postage, for trying to follow the fluctuations of the market prices is annoying to both shipper and receiver, and is very likely to cause mistakes and dissatisfaction, besides which it causes much more labored bookkeeping. If you know that every dozen eggs is going to bring you in just so much cash return, An ex-city business woman, who was compelled by illness to return to her father's farm, worked up a very comfortable independence along such lines. She wrote to the Young Women's Christian Association in the city for a list of registries and boarding houses of trained nurses. A few of these located in the best neighborhoods were selected and a carefully worded note and self-addressed and stamped envelope was sent to each, asking the manageress to supply the names and addresses of a few of their senior nurses. On receipt of replies, a few names were selected and personal letters were written, explaining that strictly fresh eggs could be shipped each morning for invalids' use in half-dozen or dozen boxes; price seventy-five cents a dozen or forty-seven cents a half dozen.

Best Christmas Poems

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

PROBABLY the most famous poem in the world—one that has been translated into as many languages, it is said, as the Bible, is best known as "The Night Before Christmas," although the author, Dr. Clement Clarke Moore, called it "A Visit From St. Nicholas."

This poem was written in 1822 and first appeared in print in the Troy, N. Y., Sentinel in 1823. Dr. Moore was a translator of Greek and Hebrew, a noted authority on theology and the author of many books on theology—which are long forgotten, but this poem, which he wrote for his two daughters, will live forever:

"'Twas the night before Christmas, when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse;
The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that St. Nicholas soon would be there;
The children were nestled all snug in their beds,
While visions of sugar-plums danced in their heads;
And mama in her 'kerchief, and I in my cap,
Had just settled our brains for a long winter's nap;
When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I sprang from the bed to see what was the matter.
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tore open the shutters and threw up the sash.
The moon on the breast of the new-fallen snow
Gave the luster of midday to objects below,
When, what to my wondering eyes should appear
But a miniature sleigh and eight tiny reindeer,
With a little old driver, so lively and quick,
I knew in a moment it must be St. Nick.
More rapid than eagles his coursers they came,
And he whistled and shouted and called them by name:
"Now, Dasher! now, Dancer! now, Prancer and Vixen!
On, Comet, on, Cupid! on, Donder and Blitzen!
To the top of the porch! to the top of the wall!
Now dash away! dash away! dash away all!"
As dry leaves that before the wild hurricane fly,
When they meet with an obstacle, mount to the sky,
So up to the housetop the coursers they flew,
With a sleigh full of toys, and St. Nicholas, too.
And then in a twinkling I heard on the roof
The prancing and pawing of each little hoof.
As I drew in my head and was turning around
Down the chimney St. Nicholas came with a bound.
He was dressed all in fur from his head to his foot
And his clothes were all tarnished with ashes and soot;
A bundle of toys he had flung on his back,
And he looked like a peddler just opening his pack.
His eyes—how they twinkled! his dimples how merry!
His cheeks were like roses, his nose like a cherry!
His droll little mouth was drawn up like a bow,
And the bead of his chin was as white as the snow;
The stump of a pipe he held tight in his teeth,
And the smoke of it encircled his head like a wreath;
He had a broad face and a little round belly,
That shook when he laughed, like a bowlful of jelly.
He was chubby and plump, a right jolly old elf,
And I laughed when I saw him, in spite of myself;
A wink of his eye and a twist of his head
Soon gave me to know I had nothing to dread.
He spoke not a word, but went straight to his work,
And filled all the stockings; then turned with a jerk,
And laying his finger aside of his nose,
And giving a nod, up the chimney he rose,
He sprang to his sleigh, to his team gave a whistle,
And away they all flew like the down of a thistle;
But I heard him exclaim ere he drove out of sight,
"Happy Christmas to all, and to all a good night!"

Another famous Christmas poem is only famous because it is the first of its kind ever written in English—and the first line of it, at that, is in Latin. It was written about A. D. 600, author unknown. It began with the ancient Latin line which means, translated, "For Us a Boy is Born of the Virgin Mary," as follows:

"Puer Nobis Natus est de Maria Virgine,
Be glad, lordynges, be the more or lesse,
I bryng you tydings of gladnesse,
As Gabriel me bereth witnesse."

There is an ancient Christmas poem which takes high place in literature today. It was written nearly eight hundred years ago. This is, "God Rest You, Merry Gentlemen." There is no record as to the author. It has been translated into many languages. The complete poem is:

God Rest You, Merry Gentlemen

God rest you, merry gentlemen,
Let nothing you dismay,
Remember Christ, our Savior,
Was born on Christmas Day—
To save us all from Satan's power
When we were gone astray.
O tidings of comfort and joy—
O tidings of comfort and joy!

From God, our Heavenly Father,
A blessed angel came,
And unto certain shepherds
Brought tidings of the same;
How that in Bethlehem was born
The Son of God by name.
O tidings of comfort and joy—
O tidings of comfort and joy!

"Fear not," then said the angel,
Let you nothing affright;
This day is born a Savior
Of virtue, power and might;
So frequently to vanquish all
The friends of Satan quite."
O tidings of comfort and joy—
O tidings of comfort and joy!

The shepherds at those tidings,
Rejoice-ed much in mind,
And left their flocks a-feeding
In tempest, storm and wind;
And went to Bethlehem straightway
This blessed Babe to find.
O tidings of comfort and joy—
O tidings of comfort and joy!

But when to Bethlehem they came,
Whereat this Infant lay;
They found Him in a manger,
Where oxen fed on hay;
His mother, Mary, kneeling,
Unto the Lord did pray.
O tidings of comfort and joy—
O tidings of comfort and joy!

Now to the Lord sing praises,
All you within this place,
And with true love and brotherhood
Each other now embrace;
This holy tide of Christmas
All others doth deface!
O tidings of comfort and joy—
O tidings of comfort and joy!

One of the best modern Christmas poems was written by the late Bishop Phillips Brooks, a Boston clergyman held by thousands to be as wonderful as his verses, which follow:

"O Little Town of Bethlehem"

"O little town of Bethlehem,
How still we see thee lie!
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by;
Yet in thy dark streets shineth
The everlasting Light;
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee tonight.

"For Christ is born of Mary,
And gathered all above,
While mortals sleep, the angels keep
Their watch of wondering love.
O morning stars, together
Proclaim the holy birth!
And praises sing to God the King,
And peace to men on earth.

"How silently, how silently,
The wondrous gift is given!
So God imparts to human hearts
The blessings of his heaven.
No ear may hear his coming
But in this world of sin,
Where meek souls will receive him still,
The dear Christ enters in.

"O holy Child of Bethlehem!
Descend to us, we pray;
Cast out our sin, and enter in,
Be born in us today,
We hear the Christmas angels
The great glad tidings tell;
Oh, come to us, abide with us,
Our Lord Emmanuel!"

An especial favorite with youngsters for reciting at the Sunday school Christmas entertainment is "Baby's Stocking," first published years ago by Edgar S. Werner. It follows:

Hang Up the Baby's Stocking

Hang up the baby's stocking,
Be sure you don't forget,
The dear little dimpled darling
Has never seen Christmas yet.
But I've told her all about it,
But I've told her all about it,
And she opened her big, blue eyes,
And I'm sure she understood it—
She looked so funny and wise.

Dear! What a tiny stocking!
It doesn't take much to hold
Such little pink toes as baby's
Away from the frost and cold.
But, then, for the baby's Christmas
It will never do at all;
Why, Santa wouldn't be looking
For anything half so small.

I know what will do for the baby—
I've thought of the very best plan—
I'll borrow a stocking of grandma,
The longest that ever I can;
And you'll hang it by mine, dear mother,
Right here in the corner—so;
And write a letter to Santa,
And fasten it on the toe.

Write, "This is the baby's stocking
That hangs in the corner here,
You never have seen her, Santa,
For she only came last year.
But she's just the blessedest baby!
And, now, before you go,
Just cram her stocking with goodies
From the top clean down to the toe!"

Soberly and with clear eyes believe in your own time and place. There is not, there never has been, a better time or a better place to live in. Only with this belief can you believe in hope. —Phillips Brooks.

God's plans for us in the new year are greater than our ambitions for ourselves.

It is the sign of a noble soul to appreciate what is worthy as it is to abhor whatever is base.

Brownie's Triumph

"Certainly, dear, for I know that he loved me with a love as true and strong as my own for him, and this makes me think to caution you never to let pride stand in the way of your happiness. If I had hushed the voice of pride and written his lordship to come to me, when I so longed to do so, all would have been well even then."

"I should like to have known Lord Dunforth, auntie—I mean I should like to see the man whom you would choose," the young girl said musingly, and not heeding the advice just given.

In after months she remembered it.

A look of keen pain swept over the old lady's face, but she had fully recovered her self-possession now.

"Go and bring me a little ebony box, dear, which you will find in the third drawer of my dressing-case," she said.

Brownie arose to obey, and soon returned, bringing a beautiful casket about twelve inches square and eight deep. It was inlaid with pearl and gold, in lovely designs, and was quite heavy for anything so small.

Miss Mehetabel took a delicate chain from her neck, to which was attached a tiny golden key.

Her hand shook as with the palsy, as she inserted the key in the lock.

"This has not been opened for forty years, my child, and I feel as if I were about to look upon the dead," she said in a voice that shook despite her efforts to control it.

"Don't open it now, then, Aunt Meta. I cannot bear you to live over this sorrow for me," Brownie answered, a feeling of awe stealing over her at Miss Mehetabel's words.

"I will look once more before I die, dear, and I wish to tell you about these things, which are to be yours when I am gone."

She turned the key as she spoke, and lifted the jeweled cover, and Brownie uttered a cry of delight at the sight which greeted her eyes.

There upon their blue velvet bed gleamed rare jewels as she had never seen before.

In the center lay a beautiful diamond necklace, with ear-pendants to match. Then there was a coral and diamond cross, with a hair ornament, in the shape of a butterfly, to match. A ring composed of pearls, opals and diamonds, with a cross for the neck. Rings of pearls, rubies, sapphires and emeralds; one, a large pearl, surrounded by six small, pure diamonds, Miss Mehetabel took up tenderly in her hand.

"This," she said, while her lip quivered, "Lord Dunforth put upon my finger when he told me of his love. It has never been there since that day when I believd he went away from me forever of his own accord. These other jewels were given me in honor of my approaching marriage, but I have never worn any of them, excepting this coral and diamond cross which Royal gave me and which I wore to that ball when I lost everything dear in life. I have no use for them, and henceforth they are all yours, dear, to do as you like with—if you ever feel that you can wear them for my sake, I wish you to do so."

"Oh, auntie, they seem too precious for me to wear; they seem like something sacred to me," the young girl said reverently, while her eyes lingered upon their beauty.

"Then you will prize them all the more, dear, and I am glad that it is so—you will never wear them lightly, and they will never grow valueless to you. You have the cuff buttons already which Lord Dunforth gave me the same time with the coral cross."

"Are those—did you give them to me?" stammered Brownie, feeling that she had almost been sacrilegious in wearing anything so precious, and not know it.

"Yes, dear, they were the only articles of his giving which I ever permitted myself to wear, and then only a few times. So, feeling that they ought to do somebody some good, I had them marked for you for your last birthday."

"I shall never wear them again without feeling that they are tenfold more precious than ever before," the young girl said with starting tears.

She little knew that even then one of them was lost. She had removed her linen ulster upon returning home, and left her cuffs hanging in it.

Miss Mehetabel now lifted the velvet bed, and laid it with all its glittering wealth upon the table near which she sat. Beneath it lay a locket of blue enamel and gold, studded with diamonds; a little bunch of dried flowers, a crumpled card and a pair of soiled white kid gloves.

"These," Miss Mehetabel said, touching the flowers, "I wore in my hair that night, fastened with the butterfly; and these are the gloves—they bear the last touch of his hand. This is the card on which the Count de Lussan wrote his name."

She took up the locket with a tender touch.

"This contains the face of the one man on earth to me. Open it, dear—I cannot."

Brownie took it, the great tears rolling over her flushed cheeks. It seemed so inexpressibly sad, and as if she, too, were about to look upon the face of the dead.

She pressed the spring and it flew open. From one side of it there gazed up at her the dark, noble face of a man about twenty-five years of age.

The fair girl gazed upon it for several moments in silence, then heaving a deep sigh, she said softly:

"He was grand, auntie!"

"Put it away," said Miss Mehetabel with white lips, "and when I am dead come and get this chain and key and wear it around your neck as long as you live."

Little did that fond old lady dream of the pain and shame which that legacy of jewels would bring upon the fair girl whom she so loved!

Christmas Greens

By Leslie Gordon

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

A SMALL spray of holly over the mantel or an inexpensive wreath in the window, a pine branch over a picture or a rope of "creeping Jenny" breathes the Christmas spirit more truly than do tables loaded down with expensive gifts or tons of Christmas cards.

If you live in the country you have not even the excuse of expense to plead for leaving the church or the house undecorated at this season for you can collect your own greenery. There are very few rural communities where it is not possible to get at least a bunch of some kind of evergreen.

A church looks best decorated with long ropes of green, perhaps hung in festoons with a wreath wherever the rope is looped up; small trees can also be used effectively here and masses of holly.

In decorating the simplest schemes are always the most satisfactory and any woman with the average amount of taste can do the work well. Holly with its shining leaves and bright red berries makes the most show for the money, both for wreaths and used in masses above the altar or reading desk or used to fill big vases and deep bowls. Very pretty wreaths can be made of laurel adorned with the red berries of the spicebush, and to the uninitiated these often masquerade as the real holly wreaths. If you want rather more elaborate decorations use the ropes of green that come for festooning walls. These green ropes are twisted from an evergreen vine that grows among the pine trees of our Northern States and keeps green even under the snow.

Mistletoe has lost none of its former attractions for home decoration, especially this Christmas, now that our boys are back home again from the war, but a little of it goes a long way. A bunch under the chandelier or a sprig over the doorway is all that is needed in the ordinary household to enable the young men to have all the fun possible by kissing any pretty girl who is caught under it.

If you live in the suburbs or in the country where there are pine trees, I wonder if you have ever realized what beautiful Christmas decorations you can make from pine branches, pine cones and spruce boughs, or in fact any kind of evergreen. The tassels of the pine branches are the most beautiful of all Christmas greens when seen against light tinted walls. These same branches make dignified and very easily arranged decorations for churches, as they can be most effectively massed to fill up large spaces. Of course, all sorts of flowering plants, especially poinsettias, with their starlike scarlet flowers or pepper bushes covered with shining red berries or even the little begonias with their masses of pink flowers are lovely at this season.

But whatever you do, if there are children in the house, don't forget to put a few Christmas greens on the mantel or over the living-room stove or radiator or grate or fireplace if you are fortunate enough to have such a luxury as the fireplace. A five-year-old friend of mine expressed the idea perfectly last year.

She said: "I don't think it's exactly polite not to put some Christmas greens over Santy Claus's doorway, just to show him how much we want him to come here."

So in that house, you may be sure, the first spray of holly brought in always decorates the mantel and, strange to say, Santy has never failed to appreciate the attention.

used car purchaser will receive just value for his money so that the satisfaction will reap him favorable consideration in the future. It is true that a coat of paint will sell the average used car prospect, but do not let this be the deciding factor in your decision. The mechanical condition of the car is the main factor. Turn the motor over slowly with the hand crank and note the compression of each cylinder separately. Should you find compression very weak in a cylinder, do not be easily persuaded that regrinding the valves will correct the condition. There is a probability that the cylinder may be scored and unless the dealer will give a guarantee against such a condition it will be well to pay a few dollars if necessary to have the cylinder removed and inspected before making the purchase of the car. Look at the springs for broken leaves. Inquire regarding the condition of the storage battery. Look at the spedometer for the number of miles the car has been driven and inquire the name of the person who previously owned the car. You or your friends may know this person and recall whether the car was given hard usage. Ask for a road demonstration and while on same listen for motor knocks, chassis rattles, etc. Take a person with you who drives a car and after going into the matter as above suggested, arrive at a decision as to whether you believe you are getting a good buy. As stated above, however, it would be my suggestion that you deal with a reputable concern which is looking to future business rather than for the present dollar.

Silk Rambler Roses

Either georgette, chiffon, gilt ribbon or velvet may be utilized for these little roses with charming results.

Still simpler girdles may be made from lengths of narrow ribbon, knotted at regular intervals and finished with large beads or silk tassels. Others are developed of strands of different shades of ribbon plaited or braided together, the ends knotted and then falling free.

Large Corsage Flowers

One large corsage flower of taffeta or velvet is so often the sole decoration on the severely plain dresses that a nicely made one cannot fail to be a pleasing gift for any girl who loves pretty things.

These are made usually of only five petals, gathered and sewed together in the center, then arranged and somewhat flattened out and finished with closely massed French knots, as shown in the silk candle-shade.

For these one will need five-inch squares; fold each and proceed just as directed for the smaller roses.

Rose Candle Shade

For Illustration See Page 19

Very dainty little shades can also be made in the same manner of either taffeta or two thicknesses of chiffon. For a foundation to which to sew the rose petals make a small circle of hat-frame wire and cover with silk. When the shade is completed, attach to the top of a candle-shade lamp, which can be purchased for very little.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

But here we go now to preparing a place to keep Jack Frost from our lovely pot plants which many of you have asked me to tell you about. A window seat made from one-inch lumber neatly lined with paper, the builder's paper is best, and the outside covered with paper and if you prefer can be covered with any suitable color of cloth to harmonize with the furnishings of your room. On bright days slide the lid for air and light and to get a glimpse of beauty and fragrance when all outside is clothed in cold winter's coat of brown. Also a cellar with plenty of light is all right to keep plants in. I have tried a pit dug a few feet deep in the earth and slide a cover over made from plank but I like my plant house best of all as it is built of double walls filled between the sawdust and has nine large windows to admit the light, and what a treat it is to me to visit this plant house and see the pretty flowers all through the lonely days of winer. I start plants every month to keep a succession of bloom, and where anyone can care for plants in winter it is best to start lots of pot plants in the fall months as they will have time to grow and be well rooted for early spring blooming. I have the most wonderful collection of Coleus that I ever saw. They are very large leaves, larger than a man's hand, and resemble the most costly velvets, and are every shade, purple and gold, purple and pink, deep purple, black, yellow, yellow and red, chocolate, maroon and so many are blotched and striped with every shade of color one is called Joseph's coat, and truly it was rightly named for every color is represented on it. Queen of the West is also beautiful.

So many wanted me to give the culture of roses. Spade the ground well and mix well-rotted fertilizer from the barn and a few gallons of wood ashes mixed well with the soil and set your roses two feet apart on beds if you wish or in rows and cover the roots well with sand and around the stem place a little sand and cover with leaves or straw. If you live where the cold freezing zero weather is, place a glass can over them the first winter of their lives, and in our southern climate where snow seldom gets over six inches deep they will live without it. If it were possible I would build a floral park and give every flower lover a free ticket.

Long live dear Mrs. Wilkinson, to edit the COMFORT Sisters' Corner.

MRS. F. T. MULLIKIN.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To clean silverware which has become tarnished from disuse or any other way, cover it with sour milk and let it stand over night. Wash in warm soapy water and wipe dry.—MRS. CLARE D. HIPPLE, Roseville, Ill.

To make garters for farmers, section men, or men whose work soils clothing, cut wide elastic shape of garter and sew on clasp from old garters, those used on corsets are good.—FARMER'S WIFE, Loraine, Ill.

If you need hot water and the top of the stove is covered with cooking dishes and there is no room for the teakettle, just set a pan of water in the oven and it will heat as quickly as on the top of the stove.

Use the sewing machine for your patching whenever possible. It takes less time and the work is stronger.

When you are using the last bit of a spool of thread, set the new spool on the machine and tie the end of the new thread and the old thread together with a small "chicken head" knot and go on with your sewing until the knot reaches the needle's eye; break knot off, thread needle and go on sewing. This uses up every bit of thread.—BLANK, Hopkinsville, Ky.

If you happen to scorch something when ironing, wet the scorched place with peroxide, place a white cloth over it and iron with a medium hot iron.—MRS. J. T. SLEDD.

When you spill grease on your floor, just cover it with coal oil and forget about it. In about a week the oil and grease will both be gone. Another good use for oil is to clean wash basins and bathtubs.—SARA SMITH, Bay City, Texas.

To remove grease spots from wall-paper, cover with blotting paper and hold a hot flatiron against paper. A preparation for cleaning wall-paper that proves very effective is made as follows: Mix two-thirds dough and one-third plaster of Paris. Make this mixture a day or two days before it is needed and bake slowly for two hours. Rub on soiled paper.—BESSIE I. RUGGLES, (age 15), Holley, N. Y.

Remedies

A good liniment is made by adding one-half pint of turpentine to one-half pint of vinegar with one egg, well beaten. Mix together and shake well before using. This is fine for most things liniment is used for.—MRS. JOHN R. KELLEY, Mt. Airy, Md.

Don't be afraid to use iodine on a fresh wound; swab with piece of cotton on toothpick. Treat for a day or two with iodine, keeping covered to prevent dirt getting into it. Later keep cotton or white cloth with boric acid solution on the wound.—FARMER'S WIFE, Loraine, Ill.

When taking Epsom salts, dissolve whatever amount you are in habit of taking in hot water and add sugar and one-half teaspoon peppermint.—MOTHER OF TEN, Smithsburg, Md.

CROUP.—Give syrup of ipecac in fifteen-drop doses for croup. Usually one or two doses is sufficient to cause vomiting.—MRS. EDNA MILLER MAXWELL, Alhambra, Alta., Can.

BLOOD POISON.—Mix tar and table salt together and apply to wound. It will hurt but will cure.—MRS. D. P. TROTTER, Wrightsville, Ga.

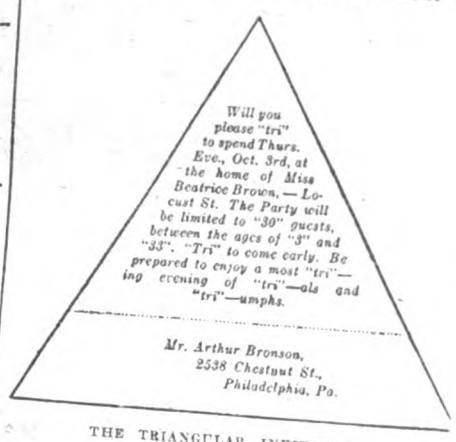
A "Tri"-ing Evening

By Lula Pauline Whinna

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.



WE had "tri"—ed so hard to have something new in the way of entertainment for our non-card playing friends that we decided to call it a "Tri"—ing Evening.

Our invitations were typewritten on a triangular bit of cardboard and read as follows:

"Will you please 'tri' to spend Thursday evening, Oct. 3rd, at the home of Miss Beatrice Brown, —— Locust Street. The Party will be limited to '30' guests, between the ages of '3' and '33'. 'Tri' to come early. Be prepared to enjoy a most 'tri'—ing evening of 'tri'—als and 'tri'—umphs."

The porches were lighted by Japanese lanterns, three in a group. The house was decorated with bunting in the three autumn shades, red, brown and green; autumn leaves were used lavishly as an auxiliary decoration.

"Faith, Hope and Charity" received the guests in the living-room, pinning upon the front (to eliminate wall flowers) of each one a triangular card (See Plate 1) bearing a number.

Three of the cards bear the same number. After the last guest had arrived the hostess would explain the purpose of the "tagging".

The three people having a similar number (as three "10's") are instructed to get together and follow the directions written on the back of their united cards. (Plate 2.)

At the end of a certain time there should be ten groups of "3's". Those not so grouped should be compelled to pay a forfeit" to be redeemed at the will of the hostess. (Made to sing or tell a story, etc.)

The groups will then be called to order by the hostess for a vocal "Tri". The hostess will hold ten slips of paper in her hand—seven are blanks. The remaining three are marked with a certain number (for ex., 3—6—9). One of each group draws. If "3" was drawn, "Group 3" would have to "tri" to sing some popular song. Groups 6 and 9 would do the same "tri".

Then would follow a mathematical "tri". Seat guests if possible (we used the folded chairs which we had borrowed from our S. S.) or have them stand in some regular order.

Hostess explains:

We are going to count from one to one hundred. When you come to "3" or a combination including "3" or a multiple of "3" you must say "tri" instead of the number; as, 1—2—tri—4—5—tri—7—8—tri—etc. When a person fails to use "tri at the proper time he or she is declared "out". The prize winner may be given sticks of (white) peppermint candy tied with ribbon of the three autumn colors.

A short musical and literary program may follow. Arrange for this beforehand but have the numbers "seem" to be volunteered on the spur of the moment; for example: We'd like to have some of our guests "tri" to furnish us with a "Tri"—o. Miss B, will you and Mr. D and Mr. F "tri" to give us a musical number of your own choosing? I wonder if we have "3" elocutionists in this crowd who are willing to "tri" to recite for us?

End up with the rollicking "round," "Three Blind Mice."

Five or ten minutes of informal conversation.

Then Group 1 is called to the dining-room. They find there several trays (large tin serving trays are best), each bearing a number. When they locate "1" they may take it wherever they please. The other groups may be called, singly or two or three together, depending upon the size of the room.

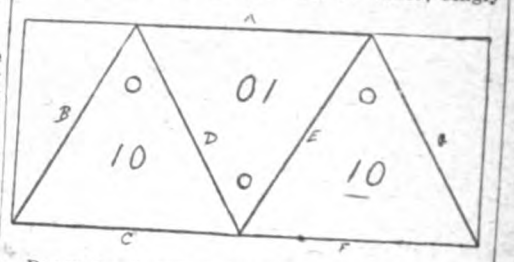

PLATE 1.—A card 8 inches long by 3½ inches wide will cut into three triangles.

On each tray may be placed "3" plates, "3" glasses, "3" napkins (folded in triangular shape), "3" spoons, etc.

It depends entirely upon the size of the hostess' pocketbook as to the extent of carrying out the "tri" in the matter of refreshments. Suggestive only: Ice cream ("3" flavors), "3" cakes (assorted small) for each guest, "3" almonds, "3" raisins, "3" peppermints, all in a small individual fancy box.

As souvenirs, on each tray would be found "3" tiny ribbon rosettes made of narrow ribbon of the "3" autumn shades.

"Faith, Hope and Charity" should be on hand all the evening as "helpers" for the hostess. They should not take part in any of the amusements.

An 8 by 3½ oblong will give the three triangles. Tie small piece of ribbon through one point and pin to front of guests as they enter, telling each one his or her number.

Suggestions for Group Cards:

1. Whistle "America".
2. Talk for "3" minutes about President Harding.
3. Imitate a "3"-piece band.
4. Sing some popular song.
5. Walk lock-step—"3" times around the room.
6. Pretend you have the toothache—appeal for sympathy to other guests.
7. Talk "3" minutes about the League of Nations.

These directions are merely suggestive. Every hostess would have her own ideas about this matter.

This form of entertainment lends itself readily to "money making". Charge an admission fee of three, six or nine cents.

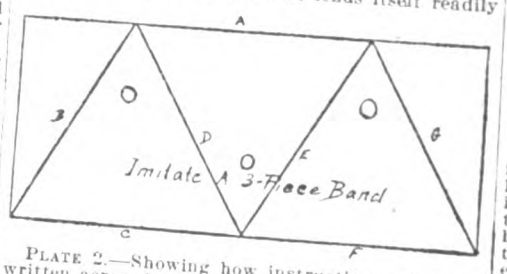

PLATE 2.—Showing how instructions are to be written across back of Plate 1 before cutting into triangles. Cut lines A-B-C-D-E-F-G.

For all failures in the various amusements exact a "forfeit" of three cents.

Sell refreshments: Ice-cream, 13 cents; cake, 3 cents to 13 cents; water, 3 cents a glass; napkin, 3 cents; etc.

Fortunes might be told by "The Three Fates" for 3 cents.

Two Wheel Chairs in November

657 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

I am sorry that the wheel-chair subscriptions received during the past month were sufficient only to enable me to award two wheel chairs for distribution in November. Was it the press of fall work that interfered with your usual activity in behalf of the Wheel-Chair Club? Let us try to make up for this shortcoming by extra exertion in aid of the crippled stranger in the remainder of the year, and don't let Christmas preparations supplant duty.

The two November wheel chairs go to Ellsworth R. Shaw, R. R. 5, Anadarko, Okla., and Mrs. Ruth Williams Roberts, Idaho. The figures following their respective names show the number of subscriptions sent in by the recipients or by their friends for them.

Ellsworth R. Shaw, age 34, has been in bed since the 29th day of last March, as the result of injury to spine which paralyzes the lower part of his body and causes much pain in the back and legs. He is the father of three children and has three stepchildren. Mr. Shaw is dependent upon his wife and children for support as well as care, and this much-needed wheel chair will be a great comfort to him and help to his good wife and children in caring for him.

I am lacking detailed information as to the nature and cause of Mrs. Ruth Williams's condition, and have only the general of her friend, Mrs. Herman A. Olson, who in most of the subscriptions for her, to the effect that Mrs. Williams is in great need of a wheel chair.

Help me to send Christmas cheer of a Comfort wheel chair to a goodly number of crippled applicants on our waiting list, and may you be blessed for your beneficent efforts.

The pictures of Inez Smithson and Jesse Fillpot enjoying their COMFORT wheel chairs and the accompanying letters of thanks illustrate the good work of our Wheel-Chair Club.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT
Publisher of COMFORT

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers it is stated that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who desire they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB and claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled child or adult, the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part to help faster each month than you do yours.

Could Not Do Without Her Wheel Chair

Calico Rock, Ark.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I wish to thank you and all other good friends who helped to get me my wheel chair. Since I have known the joy of having and using it I feel that I could not do without it. I enclose a picture of myself in my wheel chair, and I hope you will print it in COMFORT so that all the readers will see it. I can never cease my praise of COMFORT. May the Lord bless this great work you are doing. Again thanking you all, I am

Sincerely yours,
Inez Smithson.

Takes Great Pleasure in Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

Rich Hill, Mo.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am sending you a picture of my son Jesse in his wheel chair which you sent him. He surely takes great pleasure in his wheel chair and it is a great comfort and help to him. I am very thankful to COMFORT for getting it for him. I hope the 27 subscriptions which I sent in after the chair was awarded to him will help some one else to get a needed wheel chair. I shall continue to do all I can to help COMFORT in carrying on this good work.

Gratefully yours,
(Mrs.) Matilda Fillpot

ddress Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, ine. Sign your true name and give your address. me will not be published.

C. T. W., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, are of the opinion that your parents have a legal ht to disinherit by will such of their children as y may see fit, provided they possess testamentary acity, and provided no undue influence is exercised n them in connection therewith and provided the l is legally drawn and executed. (2) We do not nk your mother's children by a former marriage uld have any interest in your father's estate, unless ne provision is made for them by will.

Miss T. E. H., Massachusetts.—Under the laws of ir state, we are of the opinion that any person of l age and sound mind can make a will disposing of h real and personal property, but such will must in writing, signed by the testator, and attested and bscribed at his request in his presence and in the sence of each other by three or more witnesses com-tent at the time of attestation; a beneficial devise or acy to an attesting witness, or his or her husband wife, is void unless there are three other competent bscribing witnesses. The husband or wife of the tes-tor or testatrix has a legal right to waive any pro-sion of the will and receive the share to which they uld have been entitled in case of intestacy, and chil-en not mentioned in the will receive their intestacy are of the estate unless their omission from the will pears to have been intentional.

Mrs. G. E. G., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of ur state, we are of the opinion that upon the death f a married man, leaving a surviving widow, but no hild nor descendant, and leaving no will such widow hall be entitled to the real and personal estate or both the aggregate value of five thousand dollars in ad-tion to her exemption allowed by law, and if such es-ate exceeds in value the sum of five thousand dollars, he surviving widow shall be entitled to the sum of ve thousand dollars absolutely, to be chosen by her om real or personal estate, or both, and in addition ereto shall be entitled to one-half part of the remain-g real and personal estate.

J. F. J., Florida.—If your brother refuses to pay is indebtedness to you it will be necessary for you to ring suit against him to enforce the payment of same; f he has no property or income you will, of course, not e able to collect your claim.

Mrs. M. S., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your tate, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a narried man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving vidow and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin, such widow and child would receive the estate, after payment of debts and expenses, in equal shares; the widow would be entitled to remain in possession of the homestead until disposed of according to law.

E. F. T., Vermont.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in building your share of the line fence in a farm community you would be en-titled to use such trees as posts as may be on the line but that you should not use fruit or other valuable trees as posts; we think you should replace and keep in repair such of your share of the fence as may be destroyed or washed out; we think such fence should be a substantial one in order to protect yourselves against such livestock as your neighbor may keep and to protect him from such as you may keep; we think that if your neighbor fails to build his share of the fence, after the proper notice to him, he would be liable to you for any damages his livestock may do you, and that he would be unable to collect damages from you in case your cattle trespass upon his property by reason of his poor fence; we think either of you must keep your fowls upon your own property.

S. F. B., Nebraska.—We are of the opinion that marriages between first cousins are prohibited by the laws of Arizona, Arkansas, District of Columbia, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming.

L. W. G. Texas.—If the man with whom you had the contract failed to perform his part thereof without any failure on your part, we think you would be entitled to recover damages from him in such amount, as you can substantiate by the proper evidence you suffered by reason of his failure to perform his part of the contract.

Mrs. D. F. S., South Carolina.—In the absence of a legal adoption, we do not think the child you mention would have any inheritance rights in the foster parents' estates; we think, however, if this child can prove a contract with the foster parents for payment for services rendered them, such claim could be properly proved as a claim against the estate.

Mrs. D. C., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that no will shall be valid unless it is in writing, with the name of the testator subscribed thereto by himself or by some other person in his presence, and by his direction, and unless wholly written by the testator the subscription must be made and the will acknowledged in the presence of at least two credible witnesses, who shall subscribe their name to the will in the presence of the testator; the testator at the time of executing the will must possess testamentary capacity and must not be under undue influence from any other person.

Mrs. G. D., West Virginia.—Upder the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate and all of the personal estate, absolutely; we think the appointment of an administrator would be necessary in order to settle and distribute the estate and that the widow would be entitled to the appointment as such administratrix; we think any child born to the marriage after the death of the decedent would be entitled to a child's part of the estate. We think that under the laws of Ohio the widow's share in the husband's real estate in case of intestacy would depend upon the manner in which the husband acquired such real estate.

Mrs. W. N. T., Colorado.—We do not think the validity of the marriage of the girl you mention would be affected by the fact that she was married under the name she had always used and came to know later that the same was not her true legal name, nor do we think her inheritance rights in any estate would be affected by such fact provided she can prove by the proper evidence that she is the true person entitled to the inheritance. (2) Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all wills must be reduced to writing and signed by the testator or testatrix, or by some one in his or her presence and by his or her direction, and attested by two or more credible witnesses, in the presence of such testator or testatrix. (3) We do not think a married woman's separate property, unless acquired from her husband, is liable for his debts, but that it is liable for family expenses equally with her husband. (4) We think a mortgage must be recorded in order to hold against the claim of an innocent third party claimant without notice.

G. S., Missouri.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion that if you are unable to settle your claim for damages against the Railroad Company you mention, it will be necessary for you to bring an action against them for the recovery of same; it may be possible that the claim agent you mention may be offering you the small amount you mention in settlement in view of the fact that the expense of a lawsuit would cost you more than the amount you would lose in accepting his offer.

Mrs. W. W., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the chattel mortgage upon the property you mention was properly executed, drawn and recorded it would be a lien upon the property it covered and the same could not be sold except subject to such mortgage, and the mortgage could, upon any default, be foreclosed against the property in the hands of the new owner.

Mrs. F. D., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention stood in your mother's name, upon her death without a will, you would be entitled to a child's share therein, but if the property is in your stepfather's name it would have been necessary for your mother to have survived your stepfather in order for you to have had any inheritance rights in the property upon your mother's death; we think the small amount of personal effects left by your mother would scarcely be of enough value to pay her funeral expenses in case there was an administrator appointed for the administration of her estate.

Mrs. C. L. O., Michigan.—If, as you state, your husband sold your car without your consent, we think you would be entitled to recover same from the purchaser thereof upon the presentation of the proper evidence of ownership; we think your husband would be liable to such purchaser for the purchase price and such damages as such purchaser has suffered, and if he made a misrepresentation as to the ownership he would also be liable to punishment for so doing.

Mrs. G. A. H., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the widow of the man you mention was named as beneficiary in his life insurance policy she would be entitled to receive payment of the same and the payment of her husband's debts could not be enforced against such moneys, but if the policy was made payable to his estate it would be liable for the payment of his estate debts.

Miss E. K., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your mother can, by will, disinherit such of her children as she may see fit, provided she possesses testamentary capacity and provided no undue influence is exercised upon her in connection therewith, and provided the will is legally drawn and executed; we think any party in interest has a legal right to contest such will, but that such will is valid if the above requirements are substantiated.

Mrs. C. A. H., Utah.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that real estate sold for taxes may be redeemed at any time within four years by any person interested therein by paying into the county treasury, for the use of the purchaser or his legal representative, the amount paid by the purchaser, and all penalties and one per cent. a month interest on the whole from the day of sale to that of redemption, and all taxes subsequently paid by the purchaser.

A Forgotten Love

as she saw Gillian ready to go down to dinner. "I promised to go and sit with Mrs. Gibbs, and I'm certain to be late. Don't wait up for me."

The clock was striking half-past eleven that night as Jacky slipped down-stairs from the housekeeper's room. She had listened at Gill's door and knew she was in bed and asleep from very weariness of misery. But Mr. Marchmont must be somewhere. She peeped through the curtained archway into the great entrance-hall.

There, in immaculate evening dress, stood Marchmont, speeding his last guests, with the assistance of a sleepy footman.

"Lock up and go to bed, Thomas," the master said curtly, as the door closed on Sir Simon Wellford and a man Jacky did not know. "I will put out the smoking-room lights."

The man obeyed willingly. The butler had been given leave till the next day—ostensibly to go to London!—and the first footman had had a heavy evening's work.

Jacky, in bedroom slippers that made no noise, fled like the wind to her old hiding place under the back stairs. She crouched there as the servant went sleepily by her, to lock the side door and see to the window fastenings. But the man was intent only on getting to bed, and climbed the stairs, candle in hand, with tired steps.

The passage was pitch-dark, the house deadly still, as Jacky slipped out and unbolted the door.

It was pouring rain, but, even so, the gust of cold, fresh air that came in as she let the heavy door swing ajar was heavenly to her, for her cheeks were burning. She longed to stand in the door and watch for the coming visitors, but dared not on account of Marchmont.

She need have taken no thought for him, had she known it. Mr. Paul Marchmont, confiding in the utter trustworthiness of Mrs. Gibbs, and being at no time a man to keep a dog and bark himself, was calmly dozing on the smoking-room sofa. The butler and his friends might not arrive for hours, and Marchmont had no idea of exciting himself till they did.

But they were nearer than anyone thought.

Jacky had only taken two steps from the door when a sound caught her ears; a sound of softly shod feet on gravel. She stopped short to make certain.

She was found out—lost! For the unlached door was swinging noiselessly on her. "They" were here!

There was no time to get to her hiding place under the stairs; no chance to do anything but move like lightning behind that opening door and flatten herself against the wall so that the man who opened it should not feel the resistance of her body behind it. She crushed herself against the wall as the door swung open against her. If she were caught now she would be as helpless as a rat in a trap; and even if she were not caught, she could not see them. She would never know who passed her where she stood facing the wall, and she dared not turn to look through the crack, dared not breathe, even. If they shut the door and struck a light, there she would be, standing helpless before them.

"Come on, do!" It was the voice of Brookes, the butler. She realized that it was he who held the door open, with his hand not three inches from her shrinking shoulder.

"Oh, shut up! We've the night before us. The answer made her quiver, for the voice was Lesard's. "If we'd come in the other way you wouldn't be hurrying me on, I'll swear!"

"We couldn't get in the other way; that's all rot," returned the butler sulkily.

"You couldn't, I dare say." She knew, without seeing, the smiling devil in Lesard's eyes as he spoke.

"Luckily we're not all Cockney bred. Oh, never mind the matches! Go on, and I'll follow. You ought to know the way well enough."

"I don't know who mightn't be in the house, though; we're before our time. I heard a carriage in the avenue as we came."

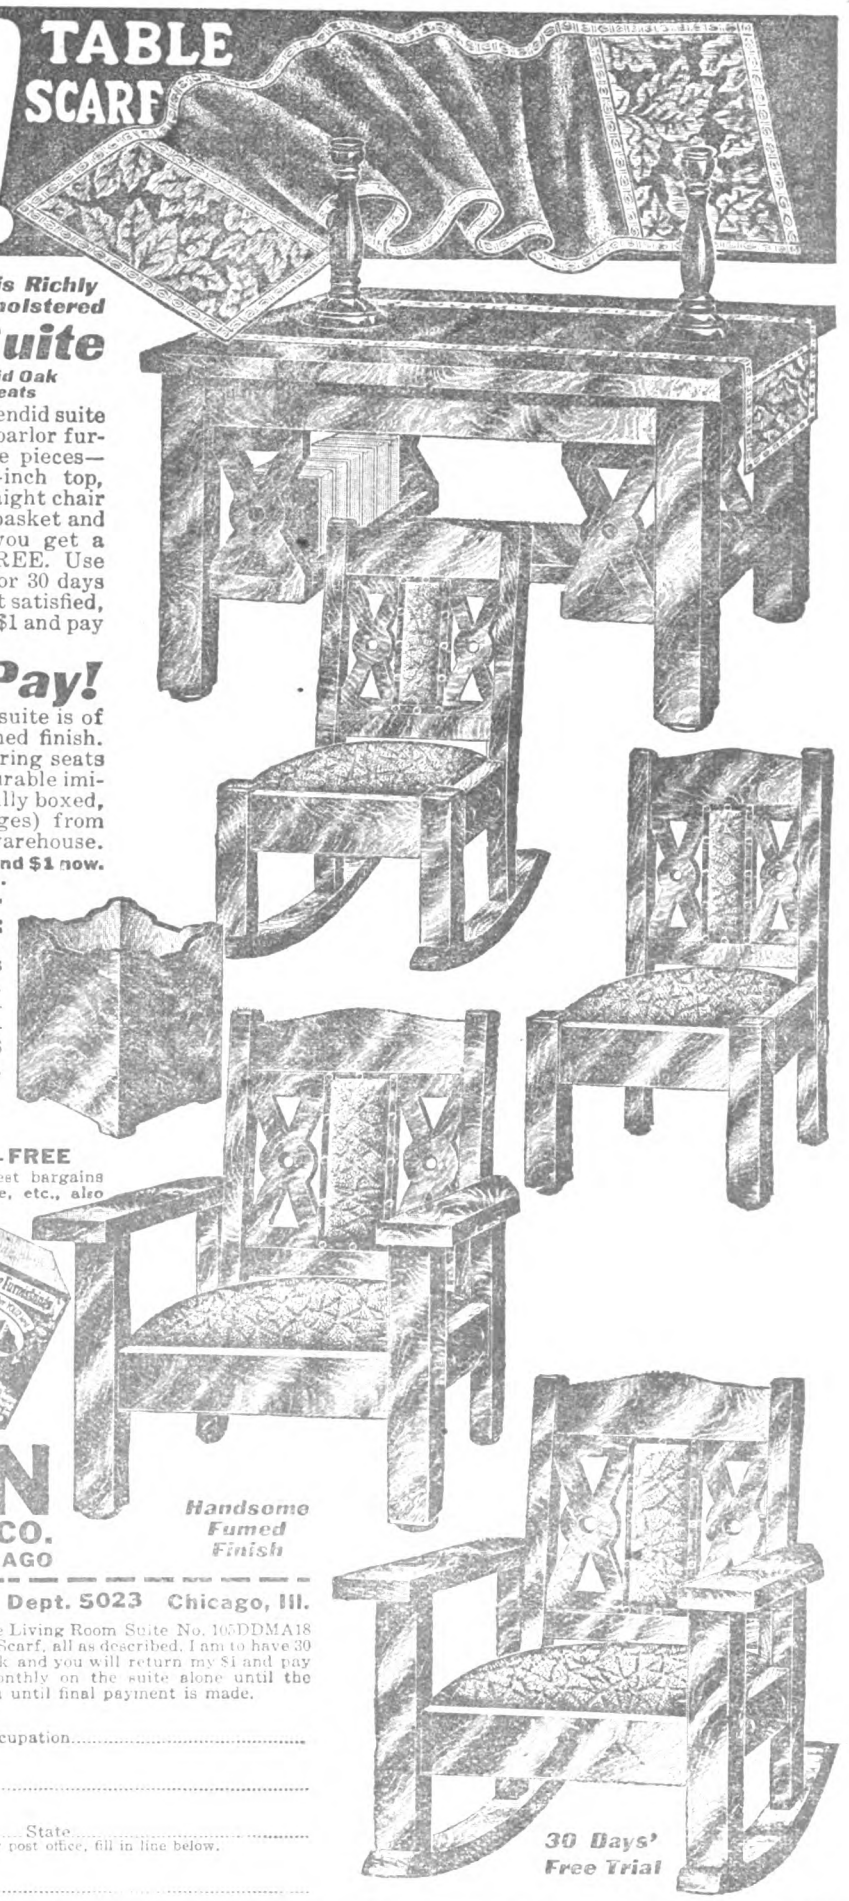
He went forward and vanished into the front part of the house.

Lesard swung the door to and fro, whistling, as he waited. Each time it came toward her Jacky was sure it would touch her, but it just stopped short. It seemed hours in her fright till she heard Brookes calling softly from the end of the passage.

"All clear!" he said. "Shut the door and come on."

"Oh, hang you and your door!" Lesard swore, as he carelessly kicked it shut, and, without a glance behind him, went after the butler.

He was alone then! The bullet-headed man was not there. Jacky drew a hard breath. Perhaps, if she had known that, she might have done differently. Well, it was too late now!



And as she thought it she little knew that chance, for the second time in that house, had saved her life. There would have been no mercy for Jacky Hamilton from Lesard if she had prayed for it all night long.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

BROWN EYES, Nebraska.—Now that all friendly or closer relationship is over between you and this boy, you are entirely correct in thinking he should return the photograph and letters he has of yours when you have twice asked him to do this. Yet if he is so boorish as to pay no heeds to your requests, we do not see that you can do aught else but further lower your opinion of him and his standard of action. You see, you gave him your photo and the letters you sent him were addressed to him—so as far as actual facts go he has a right to these things if he so insists. But to insist in the face of your wishes is to show himself both unmannerly and unkind. We think you are well rid of him.

DICKY, Shell Knob, Mo.—Surely you should write to this boy again if you have heard from a third person that he has said he has not received any letter from you of late. Say that you have heard this when you write the second time and give this as your reason for your writing. Be just as frankly sincere in your note as your friendly relationship with this young man rightly demands. If he is such a nice chap, you must not let your friendship lapse through a misunderstanding, or an error in the mails.

WORRIED SUSIE, Spencer, Ind.—You are rightly worried about your escort's manners when he fails to tip his hat when with you and the occasion requires it. As your escort, courtesy demands that he must do this whenever a man or woman, of either your acquaintance or his, is met and greeted while you are together. Show him this answer and tell him he must not prove himself so unmannerly as to embarrass you. Surely if he wishes to please you he will, for both your sake and his own, comply with so simple and established a form of convention.

E. B., Greenbriar, Ark.—If you know this boy is to leave town, you may quite properly ask him what his address is to be and say that you hope you may hear from him in his new surroundings. Then wait and you will find out if he cares enough about you to write—or if the strange town offers attractions needing no pen and ink. We warn you that boys are fickle and can trade hearts as easily as towns—at least we remember we used to find them so and we do not think styles have changed much in boys.

BUTTERCUP, Pritchardville, S. C.—Wedding announcements are sent out in the name of the bride's parents, or of the nearest relatives when no parents are living. Necessarily, then, in the wording used the bride's name must precede that of the groom. Any engraver or stationer will show you proper sample forms from which you may order and be sure that the style of wording used will be correct.

M. S., Webster Groves, Mo.—Etiquette would not demand that you make any more return than written or verbal thanks to the young man who gives you this Christmas present. Yet, if you wish, and you think your friendship makes it appropriate, you can give him some simple gift which should be inexpensive and preferably of your own handiwork. Hand-initialed handkerchiefs, a crocheted tie or a knitted muffler—any of these would be correct and acceptable. If he has the sweet tooth most boys have, a box of scrunchy home-made fudge might make his Christmas—and you—seem all the sweeter to him.

UNCERTAIN, Mt. Vernon, Ill.—Surely you don't think that when a box of candy is given to a girl by a boy, it is necessary that the giver be the first to eat "in order to prove the food clean and non-poisonous"—as you most surprisingly suggest. It would be a strange situation if the girl must delay reaching for a bonbon and instead must watch if her caller turns pale and clutches madly at the expanse under his belt. In the old dangerous days kings had their "tasters," but in these piping times of Fords and constables a boy is not supposed to be offering "unclean and poisonous" gifts to his sweetheart nor should she suspect this. Any such action on the part of a suitor would be unsanctioned both by etiquette and the sheriff.

RUTH S., Springfield, W. Va.—Thanks given with a smile as sweet as his candy would be all the needed return for this boy's box of Christmas confectionery. (2) If a woman, when traveling alone, does not wish to enter the main office of a large metropolitan hotel and engage her room at the desk there, she can quite properly take a seat in one of the public rooms of the hotel and send a boy for one of the room clerks who can arrange for her accommodations.

E. H., So. Dakota.—We emphatically do not think you should write to this girl, whom you have not seen for eight years, and tell her that you love her. How do you know that you would care for her now as you did when she was fifteen and when she then only thought of you as a friend? You do not say how far she now lives from your own town, but our advice would be to go and see her and recall your old acquaintance. Then you could find out at first hand if you loved her as in "the long ago." Making love by mail is uncertain and dangerous business for happiness. If you have carried the memory of this young girl all these years she must be really dear to you, and surely your peace of heart and chance of making both of you happy demand that you see her again and give your affection a new and genuine test. Writing letters can never do this. The difference in your ages is a very suitable one. You and she might make a most happy couple—but it is up to you to find this out.

M. P., Springfield, W. Va.—Surely you do not have to ask how you "should receive" a boy who calls at your house. If you like him and are glad to see him, act this way and this will be the right sort of a reception. And when he leaves and you shake hands and say "good by," you may be sure your farewell will be correct and that he will "come again"—if he wants to and he has been wise enough to find out that you would be glad to have him. There are lots of things boys and girls may say to each other without set phrases and the conventions of etiquette. (2) If this boy caller is from a distance and his return home in the afternoon is inconvenient, it would be pleasant and courteous to have him remain for supper at your home, rather than to turn him over to the lonely and cold comfort of a country hotel.

F. H., Wilmer, Ala.—If your aunt has no objections, it would be quite correct that this boy call to see you while you are a guest at her home. See that he is introduced to her the first time he calls. After the call, and if your aunt finds him a suitable acquaintance for you, there would be no objection, we think, to his serving as your escort to local entertainments. (2) We do not approve of long engagements and we think there are many common-sense objections to such arrangements. No boy or girl should make any such bond over their affections for a lengthy period when so many incidents can happen in life and love. A two-year promise to marry would be really no promise at all, in our opinion. Do not make it and leave yourself free. When time and circumstances permit this boy to definitely ask you to marry him, let him ask you then and let your answer be given then. Later on we think you will find that our advice has been wise.

"Colt Founder"

IT is not generally understood that when a mare becomes acutely foundered in foaling the cause is infection of the womb. It is difficult for the owner to understand that lameness of the feet can proceed from inflammation of the lining membrane of the womb, but that is the case. It will be more readily understood when one remembers that ordinary founder (laminitis) may be caused by irritation of the lining of the stomach and intestinal tract induced by giving an aloes physic ball without due preparation or feeding the horse bran mashes without water, that a similar attack sometimes follows the effect of large doses of raw linseed oil when the bowels suddenly respond after a severe attack of impaction. The sensitive tissues (pododerm) of the feet, or sensitive laminæ as they are called, seem to become inflamed in sympathy with the inflammation of the mucous membranes of other parts of the body. That should be remembered and precautions taken to prevent an attack.

Retention of the afterbirth or a part of it is most liable to be followed by colt founder. In the mare the afterbirth is intimately attached to all of the lining membrane of the womb. In the cow it is only attached to some 50 cotyledons "buttons." Infection is therefore more likely to occur in the mare. In cows it is usual to postpone removal of the afterbirth by hand for 24 hours or so after calving. In mares the removal of the afterbirth is removed the better and it must be carefully done by a trained veterinarian. He will then swab out the womb with sterilized cotton saturated with an antiseptic solution and administer such a drug as quinine, hyposulphite of soda or salol as an internal antiseptic. In addition when the mare's afterbirth comes away naturally it is advisable to disinfect the womb by douching with a quarter per cent. mixture of Lysol solution and boiled water. When colt founder occurs the veterinarian should at once disinfect the womb and give internal antiseptics and counter irritants, besides local treatment of the feet. The chances of recovery are extremely poor. Prevention is all-important.

HOOK WORMS SUSPECTED.—What is the matter with my dog? He seems to be stiff, and very drowsy. He will not eat. I have given him copperas and also dusted copperas in his mouth. He is one and one-half years old and has always been sluggish.

MRS. W. L.

A.—We suspect that the dog is infested with hook worms. To destroy them, withhold feed for 24 hours and then give two drops of carbon tetrachloride in strong gelatin capsules. Be careful not to break the capsules when giving them to the dog. The treatment may be repeated in two weeks. Burn the droppings.

SUPPURATING CORNS.—I have a horse that gravelled three years ago and is still lame. The hole if the hole is not kept open. I cut it so he would not rest on it, and he is not so lame.

A.—Gravel is not the cause of a suppurating festering corn, although there is a common belief to the contrary. It is due to bruising of the sole by an ill-fitting shoe or one that has been left on too long. A similar condition may be caused by a nail driven into the "quick" or too close to it. You should have a veterinarian inject a cocaine or eucaine solution into the trunk nerves of the foot to prevent suffering, then cut away every bit of loose or under-run horn of the wall and sole. The exposed part should be well cleansed, scraped where diseased, swabbed with a 1-500 solution of corrosive sublimate and then packed with a mixture of one part each of calomel and nitrate of bismuth and six parts of boric acid in sterilized cotton bound on with clean bandage. Renew the dressing daily. Keep the horse in a stall while under treatment.

FITS.—I have a puppy 10 months old that runs barks and acts as though he were crazy. None of the dogs in this county act the same way. What dog has a hard fit he falls and trembles. When he gets up he runs and every little noise scares him. What is the matter and what can I do for him?

MRS. EVAN J. REES.

A.—The fits and barking and running spells mentioned are usually due to worms and hook worms have recently been found prevalent in dogs in the Southern States. The best remedy, and a most effective one, is carbon tetrachloride. The dose is one drop for each pound of body weight. It must be given in capsules, care being taken not to breathe the drug at time of administration. They are given after withholding feed for 24 hours. Castor oil is not needed afterward, but a dose or two helps, a day or two after the treatment, if the dog is badly out of condition. The dose for a grown or adult dog is two drops of the drug for each pound of body weight.

Feeding Winter Lambs

dden over-feeding of fattening lambs, rather continuous feeding of a narrow or proteinration, has been determined as the cause of b apoplexy," according to experiments coned under the supervision of Prof. Wing of Cor- University Agricultural Experiment Station. is not at all uncommon for those who make siness of fattening winter lambs to have as occur suddenly from no apparent cause. aps the lambs are all in good health in the ing; at noon or in the evening one or more be found dead, and there is nothing to indi- that death followed pain or struggling. Many ese cases are due to "lamb apoplexy," as can etermined from an examination of the brain, e tiny blood clots will be found.

mong feeders it has generally been believed such deaths were due to over-feeding of a ow ration, but experiments with protein-rich ons as narrow as 1:4:6 and 1:5 no deaths re- d. On the other hand, deaths did result re a wider ration was fed, indicating that e other cause than the richness of the feed to blame.

was found that deaths occurred, even with rich feeds, when some of the lambs were per- ed to go "off feed." This left vacancies at feeding rack, thus allowing others to over- . In the opinions of those who conducted the riments, there should be no deaths from lamb olexy if proper precautions were taken to keep rack spaces all occupied by lambs at each feed- and to distribute the grain equally through- the length of the rack. There often is one or e lambs that cannot stand the heavy feeding essary to fattening; they go off feed as a re- . When this happens see that the vacant ces at the rack are closed, or introduce lambs n other pens to fill the vacancies. Do not "let lamb eat for two"! This is where the danger n average of eight bushels of corn hogged off h soy beans was required to make 100 pounds gain on 20 Indiana farms where careful rec- s were kept on this method of feeding hogs in ooperatively conducted experiment under the ervision of county agents and Purdue Agricul- al College. At 50 cents a bushel for corn, the vailing price at the time of the experiment, average cost of 100 pounds of gain was $4.20. "While the average figures show that hogging corn and soy beans is an economical method fattening hogs, there was a big variation of economy of gains made on the various farms," s J. R. Wiley, of the Purdue University Agritural Extension Department. "The things that used this variation were the size, thrift and ddition of the hogs and the methods of manage- nt followed.

"One bunch of 37 hogs, for instance, ate only e bushels of corn for each 100 pounds of gain. ey were thrifty, growthy, big-framed shoats in dium flesh that averaged 113 pounds when ey were turned into the corn and soy beans. ey gained 2.6 pounds apiece per day for 26 ys. The cost of 100 pounds of gain with corn 50 cents a bushel was only $2.61. It was hogs this kind—thrifty, growthy fellows in medium sh weighing 100 pounds or more at the start—at made the most rapid and economical gains."

Questions and Answers

FLAG SMUT.—Relatives of mine in Missouri have ritten to me about the damage done in their wheat lds by a new disease that they call flag smut. It ems that this has only been known in that region for couple of years. How can the disease be controlled, d is it likely to make its appearance here? Where d it come from? S. V. W., Nebraska.

A.—The new wheat disease called flag smut has made s appearance in the region adjoining St. Louis in both issouri and Illinois, but so far as is known it has not t gained a foothold elsewhere. It has, however, spread nsiderably in a restricted area, from some 72 square iles in 1921 to over 700 square miles in 1922, and oth eradication and quarantine measures employed to estrict its further spread seem to be doomed to final ilure because the spores of the disease are carried nd scattered by the wind. Losses have run as high as 0 per cent., but usually are closer to 5 per cent. where hole field average is considered. In Australia, where he disease is quite common, a loss of one-fifth of the rop is general. As flag smut spreads mainly by means f the wind scattering the spores, it is unlikely to mirate westward against the prevailing winds, and exlusion of contaminated seed from infected regions hould keep it out of Nebraska. Furthermore, several arieties of winter wheat are either immune or highly esistant to attacks, and if these are grown there will e little need to worry. Among the soft red winter heats, Red Rock, Stoner or Marvelous, Fulcaster, lammoth Red and Dietz are in this class. Of the hard ed winter varieties, Kanred, Illinois 10-110, Illinois 2-41 and Illinois P-1068 are highly resistant or quite immune. Other varieties than those listed have been shown to be highly susceptible to attack in the infected region.

WINTER CARE OF RASPBERRIES.—Please tell how to take care of raspberries for the winter in this climate. Should the bushes be tied in clumps or laid down? Also will cuttings of gooseberries grow?

MRS. H. B., So. Shore, So. Dak.

A.—In South Dakota, or any of the colder Northern States in fact where cold and dry winter winds prevail, raspberry bushes should receive some protection. This is best done by gently bending down the plants lengthwise of the rows in the late fall, and covering them with a few inches of earth. In large patches this can be quickly and easily done by plowing a furrow from each side and then finishing the covering with a shovel here and there to make the covering even. In the spring uncover the plants and straighhten up the canes. Gooseberries may be propagated either from cuttings or from rooted shoots. Probably the surest way to propagate gooseberries is by layering the branches; that is by bending down the branches to the ground in early spring and covering part of each branch with earth, leaving the end uncovered. The part so covered will readily take root. The branches thus rooted will be vigorous plants for transplanting the following spring.

GROWING CARROTS AND CAULIFLOWER.—Please tell me when to plant and how to grow carrots and cauliflower in northern Louisiana. MRS. E. B., Marion, La.

A.—In northern Louisiana you should be able to grow carrots outdoors the year around, but perhaps climatic conditions would be most favorable for plantings made between April 1 and November 1. Soil must be clean, mellow and kept free from baking. Weeding is important, particularly when the plants are small and frail. Drills are commonly made from nine to 18 inches apart; smaller varieties are thinned to between four and five inches, larger varieties thinned from six to nine inches. An ounce of carrot seed will seed about 200 feet of row, because of its small size. Carrots are of three general types, the long, half-long and shorthorn, according to their shape. There are also early carrots, requiring a growing season of about nine weeks to reach market size, when they are sold in bunches with tops attached; and late carrots, requiring a growing season of about three months, when they are usually sold in bulk or stored for winter home use. We seriously doubt if cauliflower could be grown successfully in your locality, as this crop is quite exacting in its cultural requirements. As a rule it fails in hot, dry climates, or in regions where hot weather quickly bakes and dries out the soil. It grows best in cool regions, such as eastern Long Island, where long summers with plenty moisture and little excessive heat are the rule. Perhaps your State Agricultural Experiment Station, located at Baton Rouge, can supply more complete and specific information relative to the cultivation of cauliflower in your part of the state. This information, if available, will be mailed to you free of charge in bulletin form upon request.

About Butter Starters

Readers frequently inquire about butter starters, what they do, how they are used, what they consist of, and why they are necessary. A starter is a medium containing desirable bacteria for the ripening or souring of dairy products. Starters are usually divided into two classes, natural starters and artificial starters.

Natural starters are the result of the natural souring of milk, such as sour buttermilk, sour skim-milk, sour whole milk, or sour cream. Buttermilk is the most convenient and common of starters of this kind. Artificial starters are pure cultures of lactic acid forming bacteria, which, when introduced into milk or cream, produce lactic acid and cause souring. These bacteria are isolated from milk, are cultivated in laboratories, then put into such form that they can be sent to users in good condition.

Artificial starters can be purchased at some drug stores and at all dairy supply houses. These starters are added to cream to develop the best kind of souring or ripening, doing away with the slightest degree of uncertainty as to what kind of souring will take place—a common fault with the old-fashioned, "trust-to-luck" plan of souring cream for churning.

Cream should always be cooled to below 50 degrees and kept at this temperature for at least 36 hours prior to churning. At that time it should be placed at a temperature of about 72 degrees. Natural or artificial starter should be added to the cream before it is placed at the latter temperature. When cream is ripened, cool it again to 56 to 58 degrees, and hold it at that temperature for at least two hours before churning. If this is done there will be no excessive water formation in the soured cream; this happens only when careful and more improved methods of ripening are not followed.

Label Butter Packages "15-oz. Net."

Secretary of Agriculture Wallace says that his department had discovered that several large butter packers are putting out short-weight packages, but that there is no law to reach them because of the label, "15-oz. net," on the package. The unsuspecting consumer, not deeming it necessary to scrutinize carefully, hands over the price of a pound.

The amount of earth brought to the surface of poor pasture land by worms has been calculated at as much as 18 tons an acre a year.

We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. A. A. S.—The year-old hen must have been hurt. Is the henhouse free from rats? If they are on free range, a skunk or fox may have caught the bird, or is there any young puppy in the neighborhood? Your rations run well balanced, and as correct feeding is of great importance at this season of the year, both for the protection of table eggs and the vigor of chicks to be hatched next spring, I will give you a condensed formula for old hens and pullets. The whitewash would not hurt the birds, but their eating it showed that they needed lime and grit.

RATION 1.

1 lb.	corn meal,	2 lbs.	cracked corn,
1 "	bran,	1 lb.	wheat,
¾ "	meat scrap,	1 "	oats,
1 "	middlings,	1 "	barley.
1 "	ground oats,

RATION 2.

3 lbs.	corn meal,	2 lbs.	cracked corn,
1 lb.	bran,	1 lb.	wheat,
1 "	middlings,	1 "	oats.
½ "	meat scrap,

Feed with table scraps or cooked vegetables.

Ration No. 1 is especially adapted for yearlings or old hens of breeds inclined to get too fat, such as Plymouth Rock, Orpington and Wyandotte. As corn meal fed with meat scrap is very fattening, those two feeds are cut down in the ration.

With Ration No. 2, feed all table scraps available, or vegetables at the rate of five pounds daily to thirty hens.

Five per cent. of bone meal may be used in any of these mashes, and the quantity of meat scrap reduced accordingly, or two per cent. of bone meal may be added without changing the mashes.

The scratch mixture should be fed twice a day, preferably scattered broadcast on litter, three to five inches deep on the floor of the henhouse. Give about one-third in the morning and two-thirds in the afternoon, which means giving them only what they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes; in the evening enough to fully satisfy them.

Mash, either dry or moist, must be fed in addition to scratch grain. Dry mash is kept constantly in a hopper before the hen. Most mash is fed only once a day, preferably in the morning or at noon, and only as much should be given as the birds will eat up clean in fifteen minutes. A moist mash is more convenient and profitable for a small home flock, as all table scraps and cooked vegetables can be mixed with it. Moist mash is improved if mixed with milk instead of water. The quantity of the meat scrap mixed in the mash can be reduced in proportion to the garbage and milk used. A light feed of moist mash sometimes may be fed to supplement the dry mash to pullets in the fall, if they do not eat the dry mash freely.

If hens show a tendency to become too fat, make them work longer for their feed by feeding the scratch grains in a deep litter; feed less scratch grain and reduce the quantity of meat scrap in the mash. It is sometimes necessary to close or hang up the dry mash hopper until noon to make the hens work harder for their feed. Feed the same rations or combinations of feeds throughout the year, and do not try to force the moult prematurely by special methods of feeding or by abnormal rations.

The feeder must use his own judgment in deciding how much grain to give the hens, as the amount of feed which they will eat varies with different pens and at different seasons of the year. They will eat more feed in the spring when laying heavily than in the summer and fall when laying fewer eggs. A fair general estimate is to feed about one quart of scratch grains and an equal weight of mash (about one and one-half quarts) daily to one of the general purpose breeds, such as the Plymouth Rocks, Rhode Island Reds or Wyandottes, or to sixteen hens of the smaller or egg breeds. This would be about seven and one-half pounds each of scratch grains and of mash daily to one hundred Leghorns, and about nine and one-half pounds of each to one hundred general purpose fowls. If hens have free range or large yards containing green feed, a general purpose hen will eat about 75 pounds of feed in one year, and a Leghorn will eat about 55 pounds, in addition to the green stuff consumed.

Meat scrap, or some other animal feed high in protein, is the one essential constituent of the mash which cannot well be omitted. Skim-milk, or buttermilk, either sweet or sour, is excellent for replacing part or all of the meat scrap. The milk may be used in mixing the mash if a moist mash is fed, or it can be kept before the fowls as a drink. If clabbered and fed thick like cheese, hens will eat enough of it to replace all the meat scrap needed. A little bone meal makes an excellent addition to the mash, or it can be used to replace part of the meat scrap. Green cut bone, if fresh and sweet, will also take the place of meat scrap if fed at the rate of one-third to one-half ounce daily to each hen. If too much is fed it will give the fowls diarrhea or looseness of the bowels.

High vegetable protein feeds do not entirely replace meat or animal protein feeds to advantage, but in sections where they are produced may be used to replace one-fourth to one-half the meat scrap. Of the high vegetable protein feeds, cottonseed meal has given us the best results, followed by peanut meal, soy bean meal and velvet bean meal, named in the order of their values. Not more than one-tenth of the mash should be composed of cottonseed meal, as the use of a large proportion of the cottonseed meal cuts down the egg yield materially, and may affect the quality of the eggs, producing spots and blotches on the yolks which make them look bad. Other high vegetable protein feeds which can be used with success for poultry are gluten and linseed meal.

Green feeds should be supplied to hens confined in small yards and also to all hens during the winter. Good kinds of green feeds are alfalfa meal, chopped alfalfa and clover hay, cabbages and mangel beets. In ordinary cellars cabbages do not keep so well as mangel beets, so they should be used up first. Cabbages may be hung up in the poultry house; the beets are usually split and hung on a nail on the side wall of the pen about a foot above the floor. Vegetables which have been frozen can be thawed out and fed to the fowls but do not keep well after thawing. Clover and alfalfa may be cut into one-quarter to one-half inch lengths, or they may be bought in the form of meal.

Keep oyster shells and grit before the hens all the time. These substances are an inexpensive but quite necessary part of the ration. Hens will eat about two pounds of oyster shell and about one pound of grit each in a year.

H. L. F.—There are both brown and white Chinese geese. Possibly your stock came from a cross between the two varieties. Yes, you could improve your birds. Select females which are all white, and mate them to a thoroughbred gander.

J. T.—From your description, I should say the little chick had received some accidental injury, as the bird seems perfectly well and strong. No, it is not natural for Wyandottes to be so slow in getting their feathers. Was the breeding stock strong and healthy? Or have you been inbreeding? If so, you must get new males before next season. Perhaps your method of feeding is to blame. Give them milk to drink, and some sort of animal food, such as beef scraps or bone meal.

MERRY Christmas! This greeting is as old as, well, as old as Christmas but no other means so much, and I wish every one of you the best Christmas you ever had—until next year. Don't let the day come and go and leave you with ill feeling toward anyone else. Remember, "The kindness of Christmas is the kindness of Christ. To know that God so loved us as to give His Son for our dearest Brother, has brought human affection to its highest tide on the day of that Brother's birth. If God so loved us, how can we help loving one another?"—Babcock.

PAT, Indiana.—Have patience, my dear girl. Seeing a young man twice a week, for six weeks, may be enough for you to decide that he is the one and only for you, but mother is apt to be more cautious. She has your interest and welfare at heart and if she refuses to allow you to go out with him, unattended, it is because she hasn't decided yet whether or not he is to be trusted with her little girl, for that's how she regards you even if you have reached the venerable age of seventeen and a half. Be content to let matters remain as they are for a while.

PEGGY, S. C.—A narrow-minded or ignorant person might consider the girl with bobbed hair not "nice" but it wouldn't make her so. Hair is hair, and morals are morals, and lack of the former doesn't mean a corresponding lack of the latter. In fact, the girl with long hair is as likely to be short on morals as a bobbed haired girl. Personally, I don't care for the latter unless it improves a girl's appearance, and so many times it doesn't. (2) There's no set age at which girls begin to keep steady company with boys. It depends upon the girl, and her circumstances. Ordinarily a girl should be through school, but if she gets "through" school at fifteen or sixteen she should wait until she is eighteen, at least. (3) Proper diet and exercise will reduce weight. Read Katherine Booth.

EDITH, W. Va.—If you've talked your affairs over with your mother then you'll have little need for my advice. However, I love to give advice. Have your mother invite him to your home, she can find a plausible excuse for it, and if he still cares for you he won't be slow in making the most of the opportunity given him. It shouldn't be necessary for you to make advances, just be your kindly, friendly self and let him do the rest. Of course if you are a wee bit kinder and more friendly than usual it won't do any harm.

BLUEBELL, Wis.—More misunderstandings and heart aches are caused by stubbornness and lack of frankness than from any other cause. If you feel that a third person is the cause of your friend's coolness toward you, go to him and ask him what has happened. Tell him that you value his friendship and that if you have unknowingly done anything to forfeit it, you wish to make amends. (2) Wouldn't it be possible for you to attend the school parties with other girls and boys, not necessarily an even number, rather than confining yourself to one boy. A crowd of jolly boys and girls are fun, even though noisy, and much better than "twosing." It cultivates more of a school spirit, too.

BROWN EYES, N. C.—A girl of fifteen is too young to have a sweetheart. Even if he were a desirable young man my advice would be the same, and he isn't a bit desirable. The fact that he drinks at all is against him, even if he doesn't drink enough to get drunk. Maybe he hasn't money enough or he may be a regular tank. Whichever it is, forget him.

MRS. EDITH, W. Va.—If you love your husband you'll just naturally take him back. Women are like that, but don't be in a hurry about it. Have it understood that if you do go back you are to be treated differently or you won't stay back. Let him be the one to show the most love this time. He'll think more of you if he isn't so sure of you.

BROWN EYES, S. C.—If a boy really loves and respects a girl he won't "act fast the first few times he goes with her," or at any other time.

LONESOME, Wis.—How could it be a "surprise party" if you knew about it? It would seem that the originator of the idea should look after refreshments. (2) Before going to Milwaukee to work it would be a good idea to write to the Y. W. C. A. there and inquire as to conditions, and if they could find work for you with a nice family, etc. Go there upon your arrival in the city and they will be glad to assist you. (3) Why bother keeping company with a young man you do not care for?

GRAY EYES, Okla.—At fifteen you needn't be worrying about your size, and you aren't too fat, anyway. Wear your clothes loosely and suspended from the shoulders as much as possible. Don't wear corsets or high heels. Give your body a chance to grow as Nature intended it should, then later, if you want to dress in some silly fashion, it won't do quite so much harm; but we'll hope you'll have the good sense not to do it.

BOBBY AND TRIM, Mich.—No kissing before you are engaged. Winks don't mean anything. Don't sit on a fellow's knee. A chair is much safer.

OKLAHOMA BLUE EYES, Okla.—It would be impossible for me to tell you how to do your hair becomingly without knowing more about your general appearance. Experiment with different styles of hairdressing until you find the one best suited to you, then stick to it.

BROWN EYES, Kans.—It may be that your sister loves your fiance herself, which would account for her objection to your marriage to him, or she may be of a jealous nature and doesn't want you to have a husband or home of your own if she hasn't. You would be most foolish to give up your chance to happiness because of her. Would she do as much for you? Marry him and let "dear sister" find a man for herself.

MRS. O. H., Nebraska.—A mother with a six-weeks-old baby has every right to feel jealous when her husband loves other girls. Now of all times, you need to be happy and contented, particularly if you are nursing your baby. He isn't much of a man, and tell him I said so; also tell him you value your baby's health and your own health and happiness too much to let him spoil either, and if he doesn't show himself a different sort you'll stop loving him. It can be done.

IONE, Iowa.—It would be better to marry a widower of 53 than a bachelor of that age. He's already been trained and isn't so set in his ways as a bachelor. You, at 33, aren't too young for him unless you have unusually youthful ideas. Have you?

MISS L. F., Illinois.—A jealous nature is a terrible thing to have—worse than freckles or bow legs—and unless your fiance can learn to control that side of his nature you had better think well before marrying him. Have a good talk with him about it—not when he is having an attack, though—and tell him how unhappy it makes you and how fearful for the future. Give him a chance and your help to overcome it.

MARY AND ELIZABETH, Oklahoma.—After this I'll never believe in names. Mary and Elizabeth are such lovely names and to think that they belong to such silly, silly girls. At fourteen and sixteen you shouldn't have sweethearts and most certainly you shouldn't steal out of the house late at night and go car riding with boys. Keep it up and you'll be sorry as well as silly.

MARY, Arkansas.—You mean well, Mary, but you are a little bit selfish and think more of yourself than you do of your sister. Put yourself in her place—if you were left with the care of a four-year-old child and a home, at your age, as she was, it would tend to make you more serious minded and appear older than you really are. When your sister was the age you are now she had the same youthful ideas you have, but gave up all girlish pleasures and assumed the responsibility of being a mother to you as well as a sister. Now that you are older and require less care she is trying to pick up the threads of her life where she dropped them to be a mother to you. Never mind if your friends think she is old-fashioned and don't like to have her with them. Chances are her friends wouldn't have cared any more about having you around fourteen years ago. You should be more loyal to her and appreciate more all that she has done for you. Doubtless she still feels a motherly interest in you, and, candidly, would any of your friends measure up to her for unselfish devotion? Would they stand by you and help you as she has done?

BLUE EYES OF KENTUCKY.—Whatever you do, don't marry the man who drinks, breaks dates with you and lies to you. Go to school instead.

RUTH, California.—Don't fool yourself, if he really wanted to, he'd ask you to go with him. Tell him how you feel toward him and scare him away for keeps, or, worse still, give him something to laugh and brag about. Boys aren't the bashful things girls like to think they are.

DEACON, W. Va.—Money doesn't always mean happiness—though I can think of hundreds of ways it would add to mine. Whether you, at nineteen, would be happy with a man of thirty-eight, depends solely upon yourselves, your ideas, likes and dislikes, etc. It's a 50-50 proposition and if you really love him, and not his money, it's worth taking a chance.

MARION, Minn.—If you feel you are mistaken in your feelings toward him, tell him so, but be sure of it first, else you'll be writing to me to find out how to get him back.

BLUE-EYED SUSIE, Ky.—It must be wonderful to have a sweetheart "as pretty as a peach," but since he has such peachlike qualities (gets mushy) towards other girls, you had better let them have him.

BLONDE OF ARKANSAS.—Freckles are rather obstinate things to get rid of if one is in the sun a great deal. Personally I prefer sunshine to a freckleless face, but that may be because I don't freckle. (2) If your father is financially able to furnish your home better but persists in buying horses and mules, tell him you are going to bring the mules into the house for furniture, the old grey mule for a carpet, the white one for a dining-room table and the brown one for a sofa. Appeal to his sense of humor, get him good-natured and then ask for furniture. Tell him you want him to select it because he has such good taste. Men, even fathers, are amenable to flattery.

LILLIAN, Mich.—"How far should a girl let a fellow go when he takes her home?" As far as the door and no farther, absolutely and by no means, no farther. Do this and you won't need answers to the other questions you asked me.

Be good children and think of the happiness of others as well as your own.

Christmasly, COUSIN MARION.

Unmentionable

The mistress of a certain newly-rich family was talking with a young man who had applied for the position of chauffeur in the establishment.

"In this house," said the lady, "all servants are called by their last names. What is your last name?"

"Call me Henry, madam," said the young man, flushing.

The lady insisted; but the young man was quite as stubborn.

"I don't think, madam," he said, "that you would care for my last name."

"Why not?" asked the lady coldly. "What is it?"

"It's Darling, madam."—McCall's Magazine.

The Woman Who Wished She Could Play the Piano

And How She Found an Easy Way to Turn Her Wish Into a Fact

A YEAR or so ago this woman didn't know one note from another. Today she plays the piano—entirely by note—better than many who have been playing for years. Here she tells how she learned and why it was so easy. Thousands of others, from school children to men and women of 50 to 60, have also learned music in the same easy way.

FROM the time I was a child, I have always had a yearning and longing to play the piano.

Often I felt that I would gladly give up half of my life if some kind fairy would only turn my wish into a fact. You see, I had begun to think I was too old to learn, that only some sort of fairy-story magic could give me the ability to play. I was 35 years old—and the mother of a small family—before I knew one note from another.

Until I learned to play, hearing music—especially the piano—always gave me almost as much pain as pleasure. My enjoyment of it was always somewhat soured by envy and regret—envy of those who could entertain and charm with their playing, regret because I myself had to be a mere listener. And I suppose it is that way with every one who has to be satisfied with hearing music instead of playing it.

Again and again, parties and other social gatherings have been all but spoiled for me. I could enjoy myself until some one suggested music or singing; then I felt "left out"—a lonesome wall flower—a mere on-looker instead of part of the party. I was missing half the fun.

The way I have suddenly blossomed out in music (almost overnight, you might say) has been a big surprise to all who know me, and to myself as well. My friends seem to think it must be that I had a previously undiscovered genius for the piano. But if there was any genius about it it wasn't on my part, but in the lessons I took—a new and simplified method that makes it remarkably easy for anyone to add music or singing to their daily lives. Anyone anywhere can now learn to play any instrument or learn to sing just as easily as I did. All the hard part, all the big expense, all the old difficulties, have been swept away by this simple new method.

FOR BEGINNERS OR ADVANCED PUPILS

I learned entirely by home study—in my spare time—from fascinating Print-and-Picture lessons that make everything so simple and easy that one simply can't go wrong on them. I call it a short-cut way to learn—it is so much simpler and so entirely different from the old and hard-to-understand methods. I know that I made better and faster progress than I ever could by bothering with a private teacher or joining a class. In fact, while I don't like to brag, within six months after I took my first lesson, my playing was better than that of many of my friends who had studied two or three years under private teachers.

My only regret is that I didn't know of this really wonderful method years before. The ability to play is such a great comfort. No matter how much I am alone, I never get lonesome—I can always turn to my piano for amusement. I am never at a loss for a way to entertain callers. I no longer feel that I am "out of it" at social gatherings. Do you wonder that I so gladly recommend the method that has brought me so much pleasure and satisfaction?

* * * * * * *

This woman's experience is by no means unusual. Over 300,000 others—from school children to men and women of 50 and 60—have learned to play their favorite instrument or learned to sing in the same way this woman did. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, we have built up the largest school of music in the world.

Whether for beginners or advanced pupils, our method is a revolutionary improvement of the old and hard-to-learn methods used by private teachers, and our method is as thorough as it is simple and easy. We teach you in the only right way—teach you to play or sing entirely by note. No "trick" music, no "numbers," no makeshifts of any kind. Yet it is a short-cut method, simply because every step is made so simple and clear, and the total cost averages a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything included.

When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of the music to mere listening? Why not at least let us send you our free book? Just now we are making a special offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now, before this special offer is withdrawn. No obligation—simply use the coupon or send your name and address in a letter or on a postcard. Please write name and address plainly so that there will be no difficulty in booklet reaching you

Paralyzed

Since Infancy

Hazel Bliss was deformed by Paralysis when a baby. The photograph at right shows how her foot looked when she arrived at the Sanitarium. The picture below and her mother's letter tell what five months' treatment did.

"When we arrived at the McLain Sanitarium Hazel had a badly deformed foot and walked on her toes. When we left five months later she had a nice straight foot and walked with her heel and bottom of foot flat on the floor. I will recommend your Sanitarium to any crippled persons.

"MRS. EDITH BLISS.

Comfort's Information Bureau

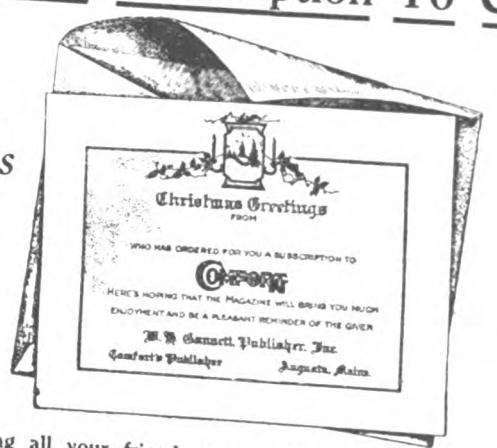
Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

MRS. C. E. B., Higgins, Tex.—Any book upon the income tax which we might recommend would prove more confusing than helpful for the simple purposes under which you might consult it. As an employee upon a ranch, it will suffice if you keep careful record of gross income throughout the year—that is, your salary, any other earnings, and any income you may derive from rent, interest, dividends, etc. When the time comes to make out your income tax report on the forms supplied by the government (obtainable through your district Internal Revenue Office or through your local bank), you will be able to note on these forms the proper spaces to enter your various kinds of gross income. There are also places to list the allowable deductions. Upon first use and inspection, the present Federal Income Tax forms are rather sure to appear complicated to the inexperienced taxpayer. If you find this the case, you have a bank in Higgins, we note, and you should consult your local bank officials who will be glad to aid you over a beginner's difficulties in helping Uncle Sam pay his debts. This aiding of a customer over the uncertainties of the income tax is becoming an established part of the service offered by banks. COMFORT readers will note this, we hope, and act accordingly when in doubt. But the Government during January and February sends agents of the Internal Revenue Department to the larger towns and cities in each collection district to assist people in filling out their income tax returns, and announcement is usually made in the local papers.

MRS. F. W. M., Flatonia, Tex.—The coin you describe is a Mexican cent and would command no premium as a rare coin. We appreciate the trust you kindly express in COMFORT'S helpfulness.

W. B. C., Seagrove, N. C.—In our country the terms Whig and Tory came into general use during the American Revolution. Those adhering to the British crown being called "Tories," in opposition to the patriotic party who were known as "Whigs." Later on these words ceased to have political significance until the year 1832. Then the party opposing Andrew Jackson took the name of Whigs. This party again disappeared from the political horizon in 1854. The derivation of the word "whig" is said to be from "whiggamore," a name applied to drovers in certain parts of Scotland. By various ways this term became one used to denote all who opposed the King or court party and, as may be seen, was thus used in the same sense when the word became a party name in America. "Tory" is said to spring from an Irish word used originally to indicate the "most savage of Irish." In 1679 the word came into use in England to furnish a caption for all those opposing the bill to exclude the Duke of York from the succession to the throne. Although the term "whig" has dropped out of common use in our country, the word "tory" still has a good standing in the vocabulary and has come to mean any person of strong conservatism and who prefers to hold always to "things as they are." (2) There is no simple rule by which a plank tapering in width could always be accurately divided to give the same area in each half. Such a problem can only be worked out by the long and rather difficult routes of higher mathematics. In the problem you give us, your sixteen-foot plank could be divided into halves of nine feet, eight inches and six feet, four inches. This would give approximately the same area in each half of the plank of varied width. (3) No more than you, we regret to say, do we know how John Archdale obtained his share of your state's soil in the time when North Carolina was a province granted by Charles II to eight of his lucky noblemen. We are sure there must be a State Historian or State Historical Society in North Carolina. Why not take this problem of early local history to them for solution?



MRS. W. F. E. O., Opstead, Minn.—If land has been posted with signs forbidding hunting thereon, no hunter would have the right to pursue deer or other game across this land, even though he had previously wounded the game he was in pursuit of. As to possession of the wounded deer, the law is that property in any wounded wild animal cannot vest until the creature is actually captured. Your neighbor or anyone else might later capture this wounded deer, and you could have no valid claim through having first disabled the animal. (2) If you have your land posted forbidding hunting thereon, you have right to cause the arrest of those committing such trespass, but you would have no right to take the law into your own hands and seize such game as you may think was killed upon your property. (3) You do not tell us who dug this unfinished ditch and by what authority it was done, or just what permission you may have given for the digging, etc. Without such facts we cannot advise you, we are sorry to say.

C. J., Palmetto, Ga.—Your small and glass-like rock is doubtless a bit of clear white quartz or one of the various crystals. Show it to some high school teacher who has a knowledge of mineralogy and let him identify it for you.

J. C., Springdale, Ark.—You ask a most difficult question and one that it is practically impossible for us to answer in the way that you would wish. Thousands and probably millions of men and women in our big country would like to obtain steady and profitable work which they might do at home. We are living in a factory age, however, and industry and production now, in all lines, means organization and machinery to obtain large output. The days of home work and handicraft are past. We sympathize much with your letter and the many like appeals which we receive from women who would like to obtain work which they might do without leaving home. Yet it is impossible to offer much encouragement to such inquirers. Really the only solution of these problems is for the one seeking to look about for opportunities in money-getting which might prove profitable to the locality. A roadside tea-room or refreshment stand, home baking, home jelly and candy making, home millinery work, fine embroidery and dressmaking—these are all suggestions possible of development. But to succeed in any of them, the necessary thing is to obtain a sale for the home work or products. And here enters in the question of brains and business ability which must play a part in all success in our competitive world. The fact remains that some people make money and some do not. There will always be those seeking opportunities—and those who get out and make their own chances of success. When restricted to home walls, the only thing to do is to watch for an opening, however, small—and to use brains and wits and hands to develop this into a source of income.

She Is Looking For A Mother

Do You Want Her?

"Peggy" The New Winter Doll

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Federal Game Law Violation

That it is becoming a serious matter to violate the Federal Migratory Bird Treaty Act is evidenced by the fact that a violator in New Jersey was recently fined $200 and sentenced to 10 days in jail for killing wild geese after the close of the Federal open season. The geese were killed during the latter part of February, whereas, January 31 is the last day that the Federal law permits the hunting of migratory wildfowl, including ducks and geese, anywhere in the United States.

The Story of Perpetual Motion

There are times when it is just as interesting to find the date when something stopped as to find one when something started.

Among the latter is the year 1772 when it was finally decreed that no such thing as perpetual motion could be produced by human hands.

Prior to that date, practically every scientist of note had tried to produce a piece of machinery that would move on forever.

It remained for Sir Isaac Newton and the French Scientist, De la Hire, to demonstrate beyond doubt the impossibility of attaining it.

Quite a little time passed before the scientific world in general was willing to accept the Newtonian theory, but finally the French Academy of Science at Paris, in 1775, publicly declared that perpetual motion was an impossibility and thereby branded all those who still insisted upon experimenting with it as charlatans.

The Distillation of Liquors

It is exceedingly difficult to ascertain when and where the first distilled liquors were made and many nations assert the right of priority.

What we know, however, is that 2,000 years before the birth of our Lord, the Egyptians had the wherewithal to drown their sorrows in something that would not be permitted under the Volstead Law in the United States.

The other countries who lay claim to the invention are China and India.

In 360 B. C the great Greek philosopher and scientist Aristotle made very particular mention of the manufacture and effect of distilled beverages.

The Irish say that St. Patrick taught them the art of distillation. However this may be, it is a fact that during the first English invasion of Ireland in 1170, any number of stills were found which, however, did not surprise the invaders, because as early as the sixth century a Welsh troubadour by the name of Taliesin had penned a lay on strong drinks.

Anti-Socialist Revolution in Italy Inspires Uprising against Bolshevism in Other Lands

THE recent anti-Socialist revolution which has rescued Italy from impending disaster, and the anti-Bolshevist demonstration that quickly followed in other lands, are hopeful indications of a wide-spread and growing revulsion of public sentiment against the Communist movement that has wrecked Russia, brought Austria and Italy to the verge of ruin and has become a serious menace in other countries, including the United States.

After the World War Italy found herself floundering and nearly submerged in the wave of Bolshevism that swept westward from Soviet Russia The "Reds" (that aggregation of radicals symbolized by the blood-color of their banners and other insignia, and comprising Socialists, Communists, Bolshevists, Anarchists I W W's and what not, all striving, though perhaps with somewhat different aims, to overthrow not only the constituted governments but even the existing social order on which present-day civilization has been upbuilt) became rampant and through political activity or by lawless violence, frequently by both combined, got control of a large part of Italy, including agricultural as well as industrial sections and important cities.

Following the example of the Russian Bolsheviki who had confiscated all factories together with their finished products, stock unmanufactured or in process, and including even the ready cash and bank deposits without compensating their owners, the wage-earners in the "Red" districts of Italy forcibly took possession of the industrial establishments in which they were employed, drove out the owners and worked the factories for their own benefit, dividing among themselves the entire profits which they confidently expected to yield them much more than they had been receiving as wages The dispossessed owners were compelled to submit to this species of robbery because such of the local officials as were not in sympathy with the "Reds" dared not oppose them, and in fact were powerless to do so.

Soon the hired farm laborers became infected with Socialistic ideas and consequently agricultural interests suffered demoralization. There were numerous strikes attended by violence and intimidation by employees of the municipalities and in other branches of the public service, inflicting hardship and suffering on the people. As an illustrative instance may be mentioned the strike of the employees of the lighting system of one of the largest Italian cities which enveloped the entire city in a pall of Stygian darkness. A veritable reign of "Red" terror that was rapidly approaching a state of anarchy prevailed throughout a large part of Italy, causing a general industrial, commercial and financial depression. The "Reds" were so numerous and violently aggressive that the Italian government was unable to cope with the situation, not daring to attempt the restoration of law and order by resorting to military force for fear of provoking a civil war which appeared to be imminent. In all probability civil war started under conditions existing at that time would have resulted in overthrowing constitutional government in Italy and establishing in its place a Soviet despotism like that of Russia. Even as it was the "Reds" had a large representation in the Italian parliament and a considerable influence in the administrative departments of the government.

The Fascisti to the Rescue

When conditions were at their worst and the prospect was the gloomiest some veterans of the World War formed an association for the patriotic purpose of defending the constitutional government of Italy and rescuing the country from the tyranny and machinations of the "Reds." They called themselves "Fascisti", deriving their name from the word "Fasces", the old Latin name of that quaint symbol of power which consisted of a bundle of birch or elm rods bound with a thong and enclosing the handle of a battle-ax with the blade protruding conspicuously from the side or end. In the days of the ancient Roman republic the fasces was the insignia of lawful authority, and as such was borne on public occasions before the chief magistrate by an attendant called a "lictor". Every member of the Fascisti wears a pin designed to be a miniature representation of the fasces which they have adopted for their emblem as indicative of their prime purpose to support the government. When assembled for public parade or other duty they wear black shirts for a distinctive uniform typical of their special antipathy to the "Reds".

Although originated by, and still largely composed of, war veterans, the Fascisti welcome to their membership true and loyal men in any walk of life, however humble or exalted, who are sincerely in sympathy with, and willing to work, sacrifice and, if need be, fight and even die, as hundreds of their members have, for the cause. Their membership grew rapidly and now numbers, as is claimed, more than a million including, besides former soldiers, nobles and peasants, business and professional men and laborers. As already stated, the situation was desperate in the extreme when the Fascisti began operating, and, as they believed, required heroic treatment which they proceeded to administer. Where the "Reds" had subverted lawful authority by lawless violence and intimidation the Fascisti armed themselves and by opposing force with force and threats with threats reestablished law and order in place of tyranny and anarchy.

Experiment in Applied Communism Turns Out a Dismal Failure

Those inclined to favor Socialistic or Communistic theories as the basis of a workable scheme for the solution of industrial and social problems should find an illumination object lesson in certain developments which were influential in inducing many laborers after a while to renounce their "Red" proclivities and join the Fascisti. The Italian workmen, who, acting in accordance with the Socialist proposition that capital has no right to share in the products of industry, had seized the factories, soon found that they lacked the business ability requisite to operate them successfully. Under their inefficient factory management production fell off largely while cost of manufacture increased in like or even greater proportion, and their difficulties were augmented by unbusinesslike methods of buying, selling and financing, so that manufacturing plants that were prosperous going concerns when seized soon ceased to return any profit, then began to lose money. On reaching the stage at which the laborers could not get their wages out of the business they were running they went to the dispossessed owners and besought them to take back the properties and operate them in the old way which they were free to acknowledge was best for all concerned. By bitter experience in having their own way they had learned that capital and management are elements quite as essential as labor in the production of wealth.

Remarkable Career of the Leader of the Fascisti Revolution

The extreme misery in the form of general poverty, famine, business stagnation and unemployment of labor inflicted on Russia by the Bolshevist government which still holds, but can not successfully operate the industrial properties which it confiscated, and at the same time murdered, imprisoned or drove the owners into exile, is in such sharp contrast to the recent happy come-back of Italy that world-wide attention is directed to the man who led the movement that has culminated in an anti-Socialist revolution.

Until the World War Benito Mussolini was a Socialist. He had been the editor of a Socialist paper, and later a college professor. As a Socialist he was opposed to war on general principles but recognized the necessity for Italy to enter the World War in the interest of self preservation. At the risk of personal violence he attempted to express his views on a mass meeting of Socialists who were trying to keep Italy out of war. When Italy entered the war he volunteered for military service. He was wounded at the front, and on his return organized the Fascisti to combat the growth of Socialism in northern Italy.

After cleaning up the situation there in a manner and to the extent already described he determined to rid the Italian government of Socialist officials, and, backed by more than a million Fascisti who were armed, organized and ready to march on Rome at his command, demanded the resignation of the Prime Minister and his entire Cabinet. On the King's refusal to permit the use of the army for forcible measures against the Fascisti the entire Cabinet resigned. Whereupon the King sent for Mussolini who accordingly came to Rome, attended by a large force of armed Fascisti to preserve order, and presented himself at the palace where the King appointed him Prime Minister and commissioned him to form a new Cabinet.

Mussolini chose strong, able, patriotic men for his Cabinet and set to work at once to reform the administration of government in the interest of economy and efficiency. He has a perfect understanding with the King who heartily approves his governmental policies. Mussolini has the enthusiastic support of a large majority of the Italian people who acclaim him as the liberator of Italy from the scourge Socialism.

Anti-Socialist Movements in Other Lands Follow Fascisti Revolution

The effect of the successful Fascisti movement is not confined to Italy but has spread with astonishing rapidity into many other lands where it is exerting an influence that at its present rate of progress bids fair to become world-wide. "Black Shirt" organizations have sprung up in most of the countries of Middle Europe, including those that border on Soviet Russia. Some of these call themselves "Fascisti" while others have adopted a different name, but all are modeled after the Italian prototype. The Bolshevist rulers of Russia are alarmed lest the movement penetrate that country and start a counter-revolution that will end their official careers if not their lives.

A recent Associated Press dispatch from Moscow, the Soviet capital and headquarters of the "Third Internationale" (the supreme authority that directs Communist activities and propaganda the world over, and is intimately associated with the Soviet government of Russia) states that the Third Internationale is considering tactics to combat the wave of Fascism which is reported making tremendous strides in Germany, Roumania, Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia. It adds that "the Russian newspaper Pravda declares the Communists must create an anti-Fascisti army and fortify their party against the rapid progress being made by the movement that swept Italy.

Fascism of the genuine type has got a foothold in Mexico and is expanding through the formation of "Black Shirt" organizations that are springing up in various localities. The banner under which they parade is the national flag of Mexico, signifying their patriotic purpose to defend and uphold the constitutional government in the exercise of its authority for the maintenance of law and order in all parts of the republic. Their special object will be to resist, forcibly if need be, any lawless or insurrectionary attempts on the part of the Bolshevists whose strength and aggressiveness have come to be a national menace and a source of constant trouble in one or more States dominated or influenced by the Communists. Doubtless Mexico needs the stabilizing influence of a strong citizens' organization.

They ed the bottles with enough accuracy for rd to recognize them and then they nearly to blows as to whom should pay for run- he errand, and finally compromised by each Hereford a five-dollar bill, so that he got llars instead of five and had their promise of a like amount when he returned with his burden.

With key in hand, he left the building. He heard the little chap gurgle: "What a joke!" but he thought that the little fellow considered that they were playing an excellent joke on the prohibition officers who had thought to deprive them of their drinks, and let it go at that.

Hereford was now in the skies! Twenty dollars! In the blustering wind there was a song of cheer, and its whistle was like unto the unvented shout of joy that rose in his heart. He would accomplish his errand, and his fee collected, he would make application to clean the streets, and return home—rich!

Already that great army, the street cleaners, had appeared. They loom up from—one wonders?—and stoically perform their duty. What is in the minds of that army that work, steadily, quietly, never a laugh, never a jest? How many of those human shells hold some pitiful life tragedy? In a short while he would be one of them but—it was for his loved ones!

Hereford hurried along and after a half-hour's walk reached his destination. The house was built on mansion lines, spacious as to ground and noble as to structure. Not a light shone about it, and its snow-bound appearance gave it a lonely grandeur.

He hurried up the steps and to the porch and slipped they key into the keyhole. It turned with the familiarity of much usage, and he went in, his hand sliding along the wall until it struck the electric button.

This illumined various lamps in a long hall, and their different colored shades, artistically blended, gave the long corridor an aspect of bewildering beauty. On various pedestals there were fine bronzes, worth, to a man in Hereford's condition, a small fortune. How easy to pick up a few and disappear. But no such thought occurred to him just then. The fact that he had ten dollars in his pocket to alleviate his pressing distress routed all criminal thoughts.

The sight of so much wealth did not rankle his heart. He was strangely unenvious. He wished that he might provide his loved ones with the beautiful things he now saw, and he felt that if he possessed them he would joy in seeing his wife and child in such splendid surroundings. If a man was capable of making enough money to surround himself with such beauties, that was his affair—he would do the same if he could. He had no patience with those envious ones who envied the rich simply because they had been more fortunate in their battle with life.

He walked down the long corridor to a heavy walnut door and opened it. Then pressing the button at the head of the steps, as per instructions, he followed the staircase down into the cellar and found the cabinet wherein the private stock was stored. A hasty examination of the bottles showed him what he wanted, and he turned to another door and opening same found stacked neatly therein traveling bags of all sorts.

Selecting a strong suit-case, he brought it before the cabinet and put a dozen and a half bottles of champagne into it. Then closing it, and testing its weight, he strapped it up and turned to leave.

"Put it down and stick 'em up! buddy" a voice casually remarked behind him. With a startled thrill he did as he was bidden, then slowly turned to see a man seated at the head of the stairs, calmly holding an automatic, steadily leveled.

"What are you going to do with that stuff?" queried the calm figure.

"I—I—was sent for it," Hereford stammered.

"Oh, undoubtedly! But really, buddy," the casual voice continued, "I have a very poor cellar to rob, and believe me, I didn't stock up before prohibition set in. It's all hold-over. As long as you intended to rob, though, why didn't you take the up-stairs? There's more valuable stuff up there, unless, of course, it was wet goods you wanted."

Hereford looked at the young fellow. He was about twenty-six or twenty-seven, with steady eyes and a fine face. And there was nothing grim in the look he bestowed upon the intruder, only a sort of sad compassion. He sat there, calmly, holding the gun, the heavy fur collar of his coat falling away from the white bosom of his shirt-front where a pearl stud gleamed softly.

Taking heart from the man's unhostile look, Hereford ventured:

"Will you let me explain?"

"Explain?" the young chap answered, with just the slightest smile about his lips. "I don't think there is need for explanation."

"Well, what are you going to do with me?"

"There's generally only one thing to be done with chaps like you and that's to turn them over to the police, buddy."

"All right," Hereford returned, "I'm glad." But he wasn't.

"Glad?" remarked the young fellow.

"Yes, for then my story will become known and perhaps I will be given a helping hand."

Thus Hereford spoke, but he wasn't glad. He knew that if his story were given publicity, there would undoubtedly be a purse made up for him, and condescending charity bestowed, and that galled his spirit. And then to be arrested as a thief. Everything had looked bright—the prospect of an additional ten dollars meant so much to him, and he had hoped to eke out this with cleaning the streets all night.

"What is your story?" the young fellow asked.

"Just the old, threadbare one. Money all gone, no job, discouraged wife, hungry kid——"

"Oh, buddy, buddy, that's what every low-down thief tries to get away with!"

His disbelief stung Hereford like the swing of the knout.

"No, by God, I'm not a low-down thief! And I'll tell you how I got here and the only way you'll stop my mouth is by plugging me. A couple of young fellows, half-shot, called me into their club and and told me that the place had been raided by prohibition officers and they sent me to this house to get some champagne. They gave me five dollars each and promised me more when I returned. I thought everything was all right and why should I suspect differently when they gave me the key to the house and described the interior? I did think it was strange that they should ask a perfect stranger to do the errand, but I laid it to the fact that they were partially drunk—and I needed the money they promised me for doing the errand. All right. That's all there is to it. Arrest me, if you like, but I don't know that you've got the right to stop me, and how can I know whether you are the owner of this place or not? But go ahead, you seem to be in authority here, so call the police. I've never been in jail yet, and perhaps I might just as well start the New Year in that fashion as well as any other."

He sank down into a chair near by and hid his face in his hands. The thought that he had always kept his name clear was always a comfort and now he would lose that consolation. No one would believe his story, and how could he get the two young fellows to prove that he was speaking the truth? He didn't even know their names.

As he sat, he suddenly felt hands passing quickly over his body, and especially about his trousers and coat pockets. He looked up. The young fellow stood before him.

"Pardon me, buddy, I just wanted to make sure that you hadn't a gun about you. You talk pretty sincerely, but I thought it might be just a ruse to work on my sympathies. By the way, do you know the name of the club into which you were invited?"

"It was the 'Petronius', if I am not mistaken," Hereford answered.

"And what were the young fellows who sent you on this errand like?" continued the young fellow.

"One was tall, rather dark, and well but slenderly built. The other was considerably shorter, a little inclined to be stout. Both of them were immensely tickled over what they were doing and spoke of what a joke it was. I thought they meant on the prohibition officers."

"Oh," commented the young fellow, "all right, come up-stairs," and dropping the automatic into his pocket, he led the way Hereford followed him.

"Listen, buddy, just take those statuettes and put them in the other room and kick those rugs about some."

Wonderingly, Hereford did so. Then the young chap opened a small wall cabinet and drew forth a telephone and called a number.

Almost immediately a connection was had.

"Petronius Club? This is Waverly. Billy Waverly. Is either Spencer or Parker there? Mutt and Jeff, you know.....All right, call them .....I don't care if they are mildly soused, call them anyhow.....all right.....I'll hold the wire....."

He sat with the receiver to his ear for several minutes without a word. Then:

"Hello, hello, that you, Spencer?.....Are you too drunk to understand?.....Oh, you do! All right, then, listen: My home has been robbed." (The grin that overspread his face and the audible voice that could be distinctly heard in the quiet room though it was at the other end of the wire, told Hereford that the young fellow had sprung a sensation). "You'll come down right away? Why?.....You know something of it?..... You?.....Oh, all right, if you wish. Good by."

He continued to smile his quizzical smile and they waited for a little while when there was a squee of brakes outside which betokened a machine stopping.

The next moment there was a ring at the door.

The young chap sprang up. "Hide behind that curtain, buddy," he directed and Hereford did, just as the door opened and the two chaps who had sent him on the errand rushed in, both thoroughly shocked into sobriety.

"Good heaven, Waverly, you don't mean to say that you were robbed?" said little Parker.

"That's what I do," Waverly returned, "look!" and with a sweep of his hand he indicated the rather disordered corridor.

"Good gosh!" ejaculated Spencer in his turn, "it's our fault. You know you were talking about that splendid old champagne of yours. Well, we thought we'd play a joke on you, by getting it and serving it to you, and then try to prove that what we were serving was superior to it, and when you persisted in saying yours was better to pounce on you and tell you that it was your own stock. We picked up a chap from the streets and asked him to go on the errand. We helped ourselves to your house key and gave it to the fellow and told him exactly how to get down into your cellar. We were stewed just enough to know that our chauffeurs nor none of the attaches of the club would do it. And we trumped up a story that the club was raided so as to give this man some reason to believe that we had an object in sending for it. But, gee, we never thought that he might strip the house. Is much gone? If it is, we'll have to make good, of course."

"So you thought it a pretty good joke, eh? Seems like it is on you, doesn't it?" Waverly said sternly. "Suppose I had plugged the chap without a word?"

"Plugged him? How could you have done it?" and then seeing the twinkle in Waverly's eyes, Spencer exclaimed: "You didn't catch him, did you?"

"Did I catch him? Well, you'd better believe I did. Say, buddy, come here!"

Hereford stepped out.

"It's a mighty good thing you selected an honest man to help you. The joke's on you, boys. You've had your little scare—now for the sequel. There's nothing gone, and this man only did as he was instructed until I interrupted him."

The little chap stepped to Hereford's side. "My name's Parker. Shake, brother."

"And mine's Spencer," informed the taller chap, also extending his hand. "Say, Waverly, how did you get hep to what we did?"

"I didn't get hep as you say and my returning home in this manner was quite accidental. After I had finished my game of billiards, I put on my coat and subconsciously looked for my key and found it gone. I knew I had it for it is the only key I carry when I wear full dress. How I lost it, I couldn't imagine, and so I started on a still hunt for it. I asked the door-man if he saw anything of it and he said no. I didn't know why I should feel worried if the key were really lost because even if someone found it, they would not have any idea as to what house it belonged. Then I thought I might have dropped it on the porch and if perchance some prowler happened along, he might find it, though that seemed a little absurd considering the snowstorm outside. But something told me to come and I came, first getting the duplicate key that I keep in the club safe. But now that that is explained, what are we going to do with buddy here?"

"I'm, that's simple enough," little Parker returned. "You know that the Club makes a New Year resolution every year to do some good, regardless of the nature of that good. Now, I shall propose that we adopt buddy and his family until they get on their feet again. Our first step will be to get him a job and then advance him enough money, if he needs any, to start out the New Year with a nice, clean slate."

"Fine idea," said Waverly. "Will you accept, buddy?"

Would he accept? Who would not when the thing was presented to him in such tactful fashion? No charity, just the extension of honest trust, just what a square man wanted.

"I can't thank you enough, gentlemen," he said. "I——"

"That's all right," Waverly said. "And suppose you come up-stairs with me and I'll give you a warmer suit of clothes. It's freezing outside tonight."

Hereford was persuaded and went up-stairs where he was soon fitted out in one of Waverly's suits which, fortunately, fitted him well, he and Waverly being about the same build.

To the suit was added a warm overcoat, hat and woolen gloves, and then the four left the house and got into the big limousine that was waiting outside. Directions given, they drove to Hereford's simple home.

Mrs. Hereford was sitting up, waiting, wondering what the coming morning would bring. She had been possessed alternately with hope and fear. Hereford's not coming betokened several possibilities: he might have found work or in a frenzy of desperation done something which had gotten him into the hands of the police. She fervently prayed it was the former, and when at midnight she heard the joyful New Year bells peal forth through the blustering storm and listened to the shrieking whistles, hope had risen. But, with the dying away of the celebration, so had her hopes died away and the sickening dread of the morrow had returned. Now, when her husband entered, she shrieked aloud, not recognizing him at first.

"Hush, dearest," he said, throwing the overcoat from him and taking her in his arms, "let me wish you a happy New Year. And it will be, for these men have promised to give me what I ask for a chance to get on my feet. The old, dark days are, I hope, gone forever."

"Yes, Mrs. Hereford," said little Parker briskly, "we're going to do that. And we just thought we'd better bring your husband home lest you think that his promises were only fairy tales. Confound that sharp wind. It has made my eyes all bleary!" And he wiped them.

Hereford picked up little Evelyn from the bed.

"You see, gentlemen, my only treasures. Priceless, yet I could not part with them if I starved for it."

"Well, I guess there's no need of our hanging around, Hereford. We just wanted to bring you home and save you the walk on this awful night. Everything is set for your starting fresh on Tuesday morning, so we'll see you then."

They shook hands and departed.

Mrs. Hereford looked inquiringly at her husband as if she wondered if indeed she were awake.

He poked up the fire, sat down before the little stove, and drew her into his arms.

"Let me tell you the story, dear," he said.

SMILES

There is nothing that costs less or yields a larger dividend than a smile. For

Smile and the world will befriend you,
Frown and you fight all alone;
Smile and your bed's made of roses,
Frown and you sleep on a stone.
Smile, you're bedecked with bright jewels,
Frown and their brilliancy ends;
Smile and the world is an Eden,
Frown and a tempest descends.
Smile and long years will endow you,
Frown and you're aged in youth;
Smile and then all will be beauty,
But frown and all is uncouth.
Smile when temptations assail you
And half of your fighting is done,
For smiles have won more great battles
Than Mars has ever yet won.

THE afternoon express whistled for the station Coeburn. A handsome girl of nineteen summers—Gertrude Cecil was her name—shoved her alligator-hide traveling bag into the aisle and arose to stand beside it. She was supremely happy. In her pleasing air one could read, "The greatest event of all my life will happen today." Her big brown eyes were two pictures of expectant joy. Her little round mouth seemed to be waiting for—but that should be the climax of this story. Should! Nothing would be said here of her cheeks and neck had they not been the typical "the skin you love to touch" kind.

On the seat directly opposite her sat two girls, apparently of the "soda-jerker" class. Their conversation caught the attention of Miss Cecil.

"You say that Calvin delved right into the cash register at Cox's Mercantile and started to run with a roll of money?" said the one of the black middy to the one of the white middy.

"Yes," returned White Middy, "but someone struck him over the head with a scale weight. I would not have known it was Calvin had the weight not knocked some kind of a riggin' off his face. Quick as lightnin' he jerked a pistol and shot a time or two. Bein' obliged to hurry on to the drug store I could not stay to witness the final results. Though I heard later that the police took Calvin to jail; and that he was so nearly dead, old Tom Hank, owner of the Hank Coal Mine took pity on him and bailed him out so his pleading mother could nurse him. I went home that evening and heard nothing more about the case. We'll hear everything today."

Instantly the expression on Miss Cecil's superb face was completely changed. Now it was one of mingled disappointment, sorrow and sympathy. Yes, sympathy. Sympathy for Calvin—Calvin Crist—a new clerk at the Cox Mercantile Company. At nine o'clock that evening they were to be married. Why had he committed such a crime?

Brownie's Triumph

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

"Yes, betrayed your trust, betrayed your aunt's trust, and played the villain of the deepest dye."

She threw her arms around her friend and embraced her fervently.

"Can you do it?" she asked curtly when she had finished.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Brownie Douglas, waiting at Memorial Hall, Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, is joined by her friend, Aspasia Huntington, a wealthy Baltimore belle, who meets with a slight accident in her dress, attracting the attention of two gentlemen, Adrian Dredmond, an Englishman, and Mr. Gordon who recognizes Brownie, she being an intimate friend of his sisters. Her father, dying before she is born, and her mother at her birth, she is adopted by her great aunt, who gives her her name Mehetabel and brings her up to remember she is a direct descendant from the Scottish nobility. Her nurse calls her Brownie from the first. Adrian Dredmond, stepping upon something, picks up a costly cuff button with a large D, studded with brilliants, and the word "Brownie" in finest letters upon the back. That night Miss Mehetabel Douglas tells Brownie the story of her life, her betgothal to Lord Dunforth, the ball given by Helen Capel's aunt, Lady Ruxley, her introduction to Count de Lussan, a man of questionable reputation, her refusal to cancel a dance at Lord Dunforth's command, Helen Capel's treachery in suppressing a note, her serious illness, her coming to America, where her father and mother soon died. She gives Brownie her jewels, including her engagement ring, coral cross and all other gifts from Lord Dunforth, and when she is gone she requests her to take the chain and key from her neck and wear it as long as she lives.

CHAPTER V.

STAKED AND LOST.

THAT night Miss Mehetabel died suddenly of heart disease.

How the next few days passed Brownie never knew, but it was all over at last.

There were no near relatives, only some distant cousins, and these, knowing they had no claim upon the old lady's money, did not deem it worth their while to come to the funeral. So Brownie and Aspasia, who had proved herself a real comfort in these days of trial, sat alone, excepting the servants and a few intimate acquaintances, in those great somber rooms, while those last sad words were spoken above the dead.

And then they carried her forth to her last long home, and laid her beside those other dear ones, who had been gone so many years.

It seemed to Brownie as if she were almost the only one living—as if all the world had died and were buried, when she returned to that great house in all its lonely splendor.

"Oh, Aspasia," she cried, throwing herself into Miss Huntington's arms, with her first wild burst of tears, "What shall I do? I have nobody in the world now to love me."

"Don't talk so, darling," she said, her own tears flowing in sympathy. "I love you better than anyone else in the world, and I will never forsake you."

She little knew how soon her words would be put to the test.

"I know you love me, dear, but you cannot stay with me; you will soon go home, where you have a fond father and mother, brothers and sisters, while I have no one. I have no object in life, Aspasia, now that auntie is gone," and again the torrent of grief rushed forth.

Miss Huntington made her lie down, and soothed her as she would a child. With her own dainty hands she removed her boots, brought a soft pair of slippers and put them on, then bathed her head and worked over her until she grew calm again.

Their conversation was interrupted by a servant coming to tell them that Miss Douglas' presence was required in the library to listen to the reading of the will.

The summons made the poor girl's grief burst forth afresh.

"Oh, auntie, auntie!" she sobbed, "your money will be nothing to me without you—gold without love is worthless."

"You will go down with me, Aspasia," she said, holding out her hand to her friend as she arose to obey the request.

"Certainly, dear, if you wish," was the kind reply, and the two friends descended to the library, to find Miss Mehetabel's lawyer, the family doctor and clergyman awaiting their appearance.

Brownie greeted them with a graceful inclination of her head, then seated herself to await their business.

Rev. Mr. Ashley approached and took her hand.

"My dear Miss Douglas," he said, and his voice shook with sympathy as he looked into her sad face, "it was your aunt's request that her will be read immediately after the funeral ceremonies, and as our good friend, the doctor, and myself were witnesses to that document, we were invited to be present at the reading of it."

Brownie bowed. She could not speak, for the tears were choking her so.

What was wealth to her in her lonely condition.

She knew everything was willed to her, for Miss Mehetabel had told her so, but her generous little heart recoiled from having so much, when there was no one but herself on whom to lavish it.

Mr. Ashley retired to a seat, and signified to Mr. Conrad, the lawyer, that they were ready to listen.

He took up the legal-looking document from the table, near which he was sitting, and began to read.

Everything, as she had expected, was given to Brownie, excepting a legacy of five hundred dollars to each of the trusty servants, who had been with her so many years.

All the plate, the house, with its elegant furnishings, the stable, with its fine horses and carriages, were hers, and she was privileged to choose whom she liked to manage her affairs in the future.

There was a long silence after the lawyer ceased reading.

Brownie sat listless, and gazing absently out of the window, and feeling so strange and lonely, as if some great burden had suddenly fallen upon her.

"Ahem! ah—Miss Douglas—will you kindly give me your attention for a few moments?" asked Mr. Conrad, breaking in upon her reverie, and speaking with great embarrassment.

She started violently.

"Yes, sir; I beg your pardon for seeming inattentive," she said, and the color leaped into her face for a moment.

She waited a few moments, but he seemed suddenly to have become as absent-minded as she had been.

She glanced at him, and was amazed at his appearance, while the doctor and Mr. Ashley exchanged wondering glances.

Mr. Conrad was an elderly man of about sixty; his hair was gray, and his face was wrinkled, but it was a noble face withal.

At this moment it seemed to be convulsed with pain.

His lips were drawn into a tight line across his teeth, and were almost livid, while the cords stood out hard and knotted upon his forehead, and the hand which held the will trembled visibly.

Brownie forgot herself instantly when she saw his evident suffering.

"Mr. Conrad, are you ill? Let me call Jones to get you something," she exclaimed, half rising to ring the bell.

"No, Miss Douglas, keep your seat. My illness is of the mind, not of the body," he replied, in tones of deepest pain.

Then, quickly rising, he went over and stood before her with bowed head and hands clinched as if he were struggling with some terrible emotion.

"Miss Brownie," he continued, speaking very gently and humbly, "I have a very humiliating confession to make. I pray you, when you have heard it, to judge me as kindly as you can, and whatever you do with me to meet the claims of justice, if you will only say on your own part that you forgive an old man, it will take the heaviest burden of my life from my heart."

She could not understand what this proud, self-reliant man, who for many years had had charge of all her aunt's affairs, could mean by speaking in this humble, broken way to her.

"You wonder at my words," he went on, "and yet you look trustingly upon me; but it will not be quite so when I tell you that I have betrayed that trust."

"Betrayed my trust?" she repeated.

"Yes, betrayed your trust, betrayed your aunt's trust, and played the villain of the deepest dye, Miss Douglas, I have made a beggar of you!"

"Conrad, man, are you mad?" exclaimed Dr. Sargeant.

"Surely, my friend, you do not mean anything so bad as you have stated," said the kind-hearted clergyman in grave tones.

"A beggar!" cried Miss Huntington, she alone taking in the full sense of the word, and appalled at her friend's calamity.

"Did you understand me, Miss Douglas?" asked Mr. Conrad somewhat impatiently and wondering at her apathy, while he did not heed the questions of the others.

"Yes; you said I—I should not have my property," she replied, avoiding the harsh words he had used.

"Heavens! how indifferent you are; I said I had made you a beggar. Not a pauper in the streets has less than you will have when the debts are all paid," he cried, sinking into a chair by her side, the sweat rolling off his face.

"Yes, yes, I know what you mean," Brownie said, arousing herself when she saw how distressed he appeared, then added: "But, please, Mr. Conrad, do not look so—do not feel so badly about it. I know auntie trusted you fully, and I am sure it was something you could not help; I dare say I shall not mind it so very much when I get used to it," she concluded gently.

The stricken lawyer groaned aloud. He had been prepared for tears and sobs and censure; and here the noble girl was forgetting all her own wrong and striving to comfort him for his share in it.

"Dear Mr. Conrad, will you please explain this disagreeable affair to me? I see it is troubling you very much. I do not understand much about business, but I will listen attentively and try to comprehend," she said gently.

"God bless you, dear child, for your goodness to me," he said, taking her hand in one of his, while he wiped his moist brow with the other. "I do not deserve it from you. Yes, I will explain at once, and have this dreadful burden off my mind; it has nearly crushed me for years. You know, dear, that I have had the care of your aunt's property for the last forty years—in fact, nearly ever since she came to this city to live."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, for thirty years I was faithful to my trust. Had anyone told me then that today I should be a thief, I would have felled him to the ground and spurned him with my foot. Ten years ago a dear friend of mine died, leaving his only child in my care, together with a property of fifty thousand dollars. I invested it in what I believed to be a sound concern, but in less than a year it failed, and my friend's child was penniless."

"How sorry I am," was Brownie's simple comment, and deeply impressed in the lawyer's tale.

He smiled bitterly, but clasping her hand more firmly, went on:

"I then did something which was not right, but which I thought must succeed, and everything would be all right again. I felt that I was entirely to blame for the loss of my ward's property, and that I was in duty bound to replace it. I had no ready funds of my own, but I knew that your aunt, with her vast wealth, would not miss fifty thousand dollars for a little while, and I resolved to use it—speculate in what promised to be a very successful operation, hoping thus to win back a portion at least of what I had lost for my ward. I staked it and lost!"

"Ah!" ejaculated the clergyman with a sorrowful shake of the head.

"Whew!" whistled the doctor.

"Horrid man!" breathed Miss Huntington under her breath.

But Brownie only nestled a step nearer the poor man's side.

"Driven desperate by this unfortunate circumstance," he went on, with a deep sigh, "I grew reckless, and invested a hundred thousand more of Miss Douglas' money, but again I lost. Then a bank where I had invested a very large amount of her funds suddenly suspended payment; but hoping that all would come out right by and by, I kept all knowledge of the difficulty from her. You know that the old lady loved the good things of this life, and was not at all careful of the dollars; and she need not have been, had I been faithful. But I continued to speculate with what ready money I could get hold of, and, with her annual expenditure, her thousands have melted into hundreds; and today, when she thought you would inherit at least a million, I have to tell you, that if I pay the debts and the legacies to the servants, there will not remain sufficient to feed you for a year. I, who always prided myself upon my integrity and my incorruptibility, have forfeited my character for probity and honesty, and stand here before you a criminal worthy to suffer the extent of the law."

He paused for a moment, but as no one spoke, he continued:

"This is my confession; and now I surrender myself into your hands, to do with me as you will. I had no right whatever to touch a penny of your aunt's money. I was deeply distressed at the loss of my ward's property, but I ought to have stopped there. However, having once failed of success in using Miss Douglas' money, I kept on, hoping in my desperation, that some favorable turn in fortune's wheel would enable me to replace everything."

There was an awkward silence when the old man concluded.

Dr. Sargeant and Mr. Ashley were horror-struck at the revelation.

It had been deeply humiliating to the old and respected lawyer to make this confession in the presence of these witnesses, but the time had come when the state of affairs could no longer be concealed. The property was all gone, and Miss Douglas' death necessitated a settlement of some kind, and it would have to come out that her niece and reputed heiress was penniless. The house and everything would have to be sold to pay the outstanding debts, and she who had been cradled in the lap of luxury from her earliest infancy must now go forth into the cold world to buffet with its storms and bitterness alone.

Brownie's face was very grave as he concluded, and all but the lawyer were watching her anxiously to see how she would bear the news.

She began already to realize the care that had thus suddenly fallen upon her. She knew that henceforth she must work with her hands for the bread which she ate; and during the lawyer's story she had changed from the gay and light-hearted girl to the grave and thoughtful woman. But still her first thought was for others.

"I am so glad auntie did not know of this be—before she died," she said, her lips quivering as she uttered those last words.

Mr. Conrad looked up with an expression of bewilderment.

"It would have made her so unhappy, you know, on my account," Brownie explained.

"What will you do with me?" he asked wearily.

"What will I do with you, Mr. Conrad? I do not think I clearly understand what you mean," she answered, with a troubled expression on her sweet face.

"You know that the law takes care of people who do as I have done. The crime of embezzlement is no light one."

"Oh, dear Mr. Conrad, do not speak so! You meant to commit no crime; you only wished to right someone else's wrong. It was not, perhaps, just the right thing to do without auntie's knowledge, but I can do nothing with you, only——"

"Only?" the lawyer asked, raising his haggard face, and eagerly reading the lovely flushed one at his side.

"Only to be very, very sorry for you, my friend," she said softly and with a little quivering smile.

Mr. Conrad looked upon her as if she had been an angel—wonder, reverence, awe, all expressed upon his countenance. Then with a deep groan the strong man bowed his head and wept the bitterest tears he had ever shed in his life.

He could have borne to hear the felon's doom pronounced upon him with the face of a Stole; but this sublime pity and forgiveness caused him to forget his manhood and made a child of him.

CHAPTER VI.

LOVE HAD CONQUERED PRIDE.

Dr. Sargeant now came forward, saying:

"Miss Douglas, do you realize how serious this matter is? Have you considered what your position will be in the world henceforth?"

He did not like to have the lawyer escape so easily.

"I realize, doctor, that I am no longer an heiress to great wealth, as everyone has thus far supposed—that there is no longer a life of idleness and pleasure for me. On the contrary, I must go out into the world and work for my living," Brownie replied, lifting her grave eyes to the doctor's face, while there was a touch of dignity in her manner which he had never seen before.

"Mr. Conrad," he said, turning to the lawyer, "this is a very grave matter. How do your own affairs stand?"

"Much the same as Miss Douglas'. I have nothing in the world except what I earn from day to day. If I had money of my own, do you suppose I would have touched any one's else's?" he asked, a flash of indignation kindling and his fine form for a moment being "Pardon me. No. But who is the yours?"

"Miss Emily Elliot."

"Where is she now?"

"In my own family. She has been her loss; I have provided for her every want by the labor of my own hands. I intend that she shall know of it while I am taken away it will have to come

"And, Miss Douglas," turning eagerly, "if you do not utterly hate me for which I have brought upon you, come to my home and let me provide of life for you? I can easily do the one but my wife and Miss Elliot, ness will give me enough to support fortably."

"It is well thought of, Mr. Conrad," Ashley approvingly.

"Oh, Mr. Ashley, and you, doctor never know the suffering which this brought upon me," Mr. Conrad continued, and pacing the floor nervously. "I am an honorable man—I am an honorable heart now, but my zeal to do well by child, my zeal that no one should suffer placed their interests in my keeping to commit a wrong for which I can Had it not been that others were depe me, my life would have paid the forf

"If that bank only had not suspe Miss Douglas might still have had but everything has seemed to be against Miss Brownie," he added, turning sorrowful girl, "you have not yet heard question. Will you come to me and care of you?"

"No, dear friend; you have enough mind and heart now, and I cannot burdens."

"It will not. I pray you, give faction of doing this much toward consequences of my wrong," he pleaded

"My dear," interposed the clergyman sively, "I advise you, by all means Conrad's hospitality and protection. young and not at all fitted to do battle world. It will never do for you to port yourself; you are entirely ignorant ways of the world."

"Mr. Ashley, there are hundreds, sands, as young, and even more delicate who not only support themselves but maintaining their father and mother and sisters," returned Brownie. "I to be of finer clay than my unfortunate

"But they have been brought up posed Mr. Conrad.

"Some of them have and some have has given me health; and, thanks who took infinite pains with me, I have cellent education; and, gentlemen, I competent to take care of myself," returned proudly, yet with a more than she had worn since Miss Mehetabel

In vain they pleaded and urged clergyman and the doctor offering with them, if she would not go with She remained firm, and they were miration at the strength of character displayed.

"I will try for a while," she said bitterly disappointed Mr. Conrad will fail, I shall know where to come for "You are not strong, you will break der it," he said gloomily.

"I think not," was the cheerful have always sympathized with the and now I shall know by actual experience their life is."

"What will you do?" the lawyer great tears rolled down his wrinkled

"I do not know yet; I shall have that point a while."

Then, after a few minutes' thoughtful ing his distress, she added:

"At all events, whatever I undertake I promise you I will not refuse the offer me; and if I need a friend I shall know where to find him."

She held out her hand to him with winning smile, and again the strong down, weeping like a child, and there dry eye in the room excepting her own.

"But Mr. Conrad offered to relieve all anxiety about your future. Why accept his offer?"

"I will never be dependent upon myself," Brownie said haughtily.

"But you will lose caste."

"Perhaps; but I shall not lose nor my self-respect," was the very cold reply.

"Your friends will forsake you."

"They are not worthy the name," regret," and the delicate red lips curled finite scorn, yet there was the faintest quiver upon them and a wistful look in beautiful eyes.

Would Aspasia go with the rest?

"Do you not care if you lose them?" asked eagerly.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

You asked for Christmas suggestions in the September COMFORT. As I have helped at large bazaars will give you an idea of a few things.

There are many beautiful things you can buy but I find that a home-made, inexpensive article, made by loving hands and with kind thoughts the best and most useful. There are many letters waiting so will shorten this as much as possible.

Lovely things can be made of unbleached muslin, dresses, aprons, luncheon sets, scarfs, sash curtains, etc. These can be trimmed with checked and plain gingham, applique, put on as is often shown on the needlework pages of COMFORT. See June number. Everyone uses towels and wash-cloths. Buy toweling, cut in towel size, scallop, and sew on colored rickrack braid, or crochet lace and sew on edges. Make wash-cloth to match towel.

Then there are painted articles; don't say you can't paint. The designs used are so simple. Buy a can of talcum powder, the ten-cent stores have a nice grade in a tall, well shaped can. Paint the can black and when dry put on a design in yellow, red, blue and green. These cans of paint can be gotten in any five-and ten-cent store. I go to the large department stores and buy ten-cent articles in odd glassware, such as salt and pepper shakers, glass candlesticks, vases, dishes, plain white plates, etc. Paint them all black or just the rims. When dry put on a bright design. Also treat any tin box you have in your home the same way, make candy or cookies and fill the box. Anyone, young or old, will enjoy such a gift.

Black patent leather bags with painted designs or crocheted flowers are very pretty for the young girl. (See July COMFORT, pages 14-15.) Then for those who have plants to give away, paint the pot as is shown on page 17, September issue. Who wouldn't appreciate a plant, no matter how small. I know I would. Then for those who have lots of flower seeds, put some in an envelope and paint on it a design in water colors or paste a pretty floral card on it with some verse such as follows:

"Gaily they wave in the bright sunlight,
Gay flowers, red, blue and white,
May they bring a lot of happiness to you,
The long bright days, the summer through."

Can you imagine a sweeter gift than flowers all next summer?

Let the children make Christmas gifts, they enjoy it. My little girl of eight and one-half years can make kettle holders, calendars, work designs on dish towels, the designs I draw for her, and ever so many little things.

I am an old subscriber, as my last letter appeared about seven years ago and many will remember me as Mrs. M. C. B., but since then have added another letter to my name. Who says a second marriage isn't successful?

Before I forget, why not give a year's subscription to COMFORT as a Christmas gift. A better one could not be found.

MRS. M. B. G.

NATURAL BRIDGE, ALA.

DEAR SISTERS—AND BROTHERS:

I do believe we are the most free-hearted set of women in the world, to share our deliciously comfy corner with all those masculine "critters" who come buttin' in, even as I am doing, to air their opinions of men, maids and other things of little consequence. Oh, well, we are glad to have them to break the monotony.

I wish I could discuss the "care of babies" or "how to keep the boy on the farm," etc., but being steered by fate into a channel flowing swiftly toward the Sea of Spinsterhood, my talk will have to be on something light, to fit my mind.

"Dolls" are a good subject. How many of you make your kiddies' dolls and other toys? I have a hard-headed, rip-tearing, adorable kid for a niece, who is the life of the family and may be the death of it, but she has to have playthings just like nice, quiet children so on her first birthday (November 11, 1921) my sister made her a cunning black cat which is the delight of her life and it has withstood her "loving caresses" admirably. Cats are not dolls, however, and that, you know, was to be my subject. When everybody was crazy about unbleached domestic, making curtains, dresses, cushions and nearly everything out of it, I took the "nearly" out by making real stand-up dolls, with sure enough pull-off clothes and my! how the kiddies do love 'em. I cut my own pattern which took eight separate pieces of paper. The doll is in fifteen pieces. It takes all this to give dolly the perfect form that its little mother loves. When finished and stuffed I paint them. Oh horrors! But they learned it from us and they declare they are not fit to make any child happy without their complexions. Some of them want to be peroxide blondes, some hennaed vamps, and some

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

MRS. Caroline Radford of Columbus, Nebraska, wins the COMFORT'S Sisters' Pin for the "best" recipe this month. The conditions of this prize contest have been explained in preceding numbers. We hope Mrs. Radford will enjoy her pin as much as we shall enjoy her chicken pie, and it isn't necessary to wait until a cold day to make one, either.—Ed.

CHICKEN PIE.—After a large chicken has been well cleaned and cut into pieces, put on to boil in cold water. Cook till it is almost done then add salt and pepper to taste. If not rich enough add a bit of butter. Make a thickening of one-half cup of flour and just enough cold water to stir to a cream. See that plenty of broth is in the kettle, add hot water if needed. Turn into a well-greased bread pan, after the thickening has been boiled into the chicken to make a good gravy. Use one quart of flour, two-thirds teaspoon salt, two teaspoons baking powder and sift together. Add one-half cup lard and mix, with enough sweet milk or water to make a good biscuit dough. Roll almost an inch thick, cut in rounds and place on top of chicken, after seeing there is enough gravy to come to top of chicken. Bake in hot oven till biscuits are done. This is excellent on a cold day for dinner or supper, to be served hot.—MRS. CAROLINE RADFORD, Columbus, West 13th St. Nebr.

SOUR MILK DOUGHNUTS.—Three even tablespoons of butter creamed with one cup of sugar. Add two well-beaten eggs and one cup of thick sour milk. Beat in four cups of flour sifted again with one-fourth teaspoon each of cinnamon and nutmeg, half a teaspoon of soda, and one-fourth teaspoon of salt, using enough more flour to just handle. Care must be taken not to have the dough too stiff at first as each time of cutting the trimmings add a little more flour to the next ball of dough. Start with a very little dough at first, and cut them all before commencing to fry. Care must be taken not to have the fat smoking hot, but just hot enough for the dough to rise to the top at once.

SMOTHERED RABBIT.—Flour rabbit and fry to a light brown, add several slices of onion, four or five cloves, one teaspoon vinegar, a little salt and pepper and enough hot water to cover. Cook slowly in oven two hours.—MRS. METTIE ALGOOD, Stony Fork, N. C.

SALMON LOAF.—One can of salmon, well shredded, add three cold biscuit that have been put through food chopper or finely chopped, one onion, chopped fine, one-quarer cup of vinegar, two beaten eggs, one tablespoon of melted butter, salt and pepper to season. Mix well and bake half an hour in moderate oven, until browned on top.—MRS. C. M. FITZGERALD, Ennis, Texas.

HOT POTATO SALAD WITH COLD MEAT.—Scrub and boil potatoes without paring in salted water. Set in oven a few minutes after draining. Peel and cut into cubes and put into baking dish, sprinkling each layer with salt and paprika. Heat four tablespoons of salad oil with two of lemon juice and pour over the potato. Set into the oven until very hot. Have cold meat arranged around the edge of platter and pour the salad into the center. Sprinkle the top with finely-chopped celery and a little scraped onion.

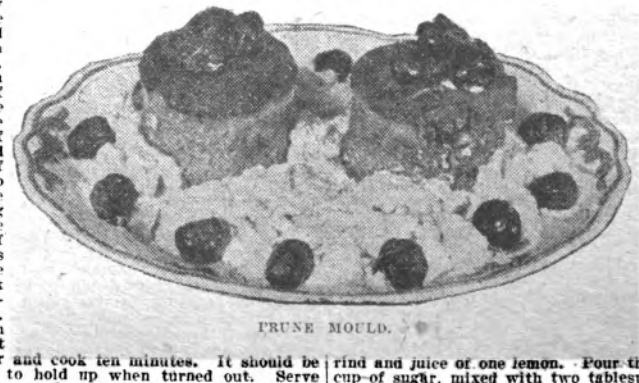
FRIED EGG PLANT.—Peel egg plant, cut in discs one-third inch thick, soak in slightly salted milk or water for fifteen minutes, dip in beaten egg, then in cracker-crumbs and fry in butter or olive oil until nicely browned. Serve with slices of lemon.

EGG PLANT FRITTERS.—Pare an egg plant and cut into dice, boil until soft, drain, add two well-beaten eggs, two slices of bread previously soaked in milk and season to suit taste. Drop large spoonfuls on well-greased griddle and fry until brown and crisp.



STUFFED EGG PLANT WITH NUT SAUCE.—Boil egg plant (entire) for fifteen minutes, then cut in two. When cool enough to handle, scoop out the pulp, being careful not to break the skin, season and add one tablespoon melted butter, one cup bread-crumbs, one well-beaten egg, one teaspoon of onion juice and a little salt. Mix well, fill the shells and bake until browned on top. For the nut sauce, add finely-chopped walnuts or pecans to white sauce.

EGG PLANT OYSTERS.—Two parts egg plant, cooked and pounded into paste, one part soft bread-crumbs; add salt and one teaspoon melted butter to each cup of egg plant and bread-crumbs. Form into oyster-shaped cakes, dip in beaten egg and bread-crumbs and fry brown and crisp. Serve with slices of lemon.—NAOMI FISCHER, Roanoke, Ill.

SPONGE CAKE.—Beat three egg yolks to a bright yellow and gradually add one and one-half cup of sugar. Add one-half cup of cold water and one teaspoon of vanilla, and beat the whole to a cream with an egg beater. Beat in two cups of sifted flour to which one teaspoon of cream of tartar and one-half teaspoon of soda has been added. Lastly add the beaten whites.

SOFT MOLASSES GINGERBREAD.—One egg, one cup of molasses, one-third cup sugar, one-half cup of melted butter and lard, one-half cup of milk (sweet or sour), if sweet milk is used, one teaspoon of soda; if sour milk is used, one heaping teaspoon of soda; one teaspoon cloves, two and one-half cups flour, a little salt.

PRUNE MOULD.—Soak two-thirds of a pound of prunes half an hour; wash and drain. Cover with one pint of cold water; let stand one hour, and then simmer in same water until very soft. Remove prunes, skin and stone, and mash the prune pulp. Add one and a quarter cup of corn syrup, or one cup of sugar, the grated rind of half a lemon and one tablespoon of the juice. Add to the prune juice enough boiling water to make one and a half cup, and pour this into the prune mixture. Cook about fifteen minutes very slowly. Thicken with corn-starch first wet in cold water and cook ten minutes. It should be just stiff enough to hold up when turned out. Serve with whipped cream and garnish with whole prunes.

PRUNE MOULD.

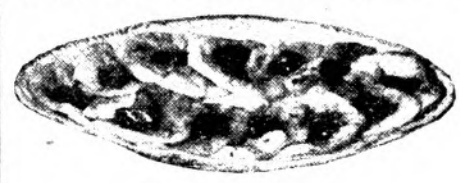
SUGAR GINGERBREAD.—One cup sugar, one cup of butter, one egg, five tablespoons of milk, one teaspoon soda, four cups of bread flour, nutmeg and ginger. Knead quite stiff; roll thin.



PORK CAKE.—One pound of English walnuts, one pound currants, one pound raisins, one pound brown sugar, one pound fresh fat pork, one pound flour, four eggs, one cup sweet milk, one tablespoon baking powder, one teaspoon each cinnamon, cloves and allspice and one-half teaspoon salt. Grind the walnuts, raisins, currants and pork through food chopper, mix with sugar, then the eggs, slightly beaten, milk and the spices and baking powder with flour enough to make thick dough. Bake in medium oven.

COFFEE ROLL.—Take one pound (two cups) bread dough, four tablespoons sugar, one or two eggs and one teaspoon butter. Knead and let rise two and one-half hours, work down, let rise one hour, roll out and sprinkle with raisins or nuts, or both; roll into a long roll and form a ring, pinch ends together and raise one and one-half hours. Bake thirty minutes. While warm cover with a frosting made of one cup of pulverized sugar and one tablespoon milk. Delicious.—BLACK EYES, Alliance, Nebr.

FEATHER CAKE.—One and one-half cup sugar, two-thirds cup butter, three eggs, one cup sweet milk, three level teaspoons baking powder one teaspoon vanilla and two and one-half cups flour. Mix in order given and divide the dough into four parts. Color the first part with two squares of melted chocolate; the second part with pink coloring; leave the other two parts uncolored. Bake in four separate tins. Lemon jelly to be put between layers. Beat one egg; add one cup of water, grated rind and juice of one lemon. SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Tom Hamilton, born rich, dies poor, leaving two daughters, Gillian and Jacqueline, to the care of his father's housekeeper. Upon her death there is left forty pounds a year. Mr. Marchmont, in league with his butler, housekeeper and Lesard, buys Hamilton Place and is anxious to adopt both girls that he may gain admittance to the neighboring houses. Jacky refuses; she has no faith in him, and finding Gill in tears begs her not to stay if unwilling. Gill admits there was someone in London and he writes he cannot have her for his wife. She refuses to give his name. Three months later and she wonders why Marchmont adopted her and wishes there had not been the burglary at Lord Hollis's. Lesard, in love with Jacky, will care for her. If alone she would marry him, but she must go to Gill, who is unhappy. Lesard warns her not to go—it is no place for any woman. He does not explain but asks her to trust him. Mrs. Gibbs, the housekeeper, engages a new maid, Mary James, who is Jacky in disguise. Gill confesses her fears that Marchmont is an impostor and cautions Jacky to avoid him, and Jacky knows Lesard is right. She remodels a velvet dress sewn with amethysts for Mrs. Gibbs, who tells Jacky she is to accompany Gill and Mr. Marchmont to Sir Simon Wellford's, where there is to be a grand party. Jacky, that night, hearing footsteps, and a whistle which reminds her of Lesard, listens, and with shoes in hand steals down the stair-case and spies three men, Marchmont, a stranger and Lesard, and hears from him, "here's luck to the ball." With his words, "Promise to trust me whatever happens," ringing in her ears, she gets Gill ready for the visit and at Lady Wellford's has a room next to Gill's. Sir Charles Vivian takes Gill into dinner. The masked ball follows and Gill smuggles Jacky in dressed in a white domino, where she recognizes Lesard in the guise of a monk and fails to make him reveal his identity, leaving her baffled. Following him and Gill in search of Jacky, they see the robbery and rather than make an outcry Gill admits he is her husband. With the guests at supper a robbery is committed. Mrs. Fareham's jewels, her grace's, too, are missing and only Gillian's jewel case left. Detectives arrive and Sir Charles Vivian's statements, as to his movements before the dinner, relieve him and Gill of suspicion. Requesting to see her maid and how she forgot the jewels, Gillian admits she was sick in bed and knew nothing about her not wearing them. The robbery breaks up the party, and Jacky, packing up, asks Gill what they are to do. It's done. If Gill tells all she knows she may find out Lesard is married before, and Jacky reads his last letter to Gill, and while loathing the man whom she believes has wronged both, she knows they are not strong and brave enough. Marchmont insists that Gillian shall appear at dinner and Jacky requests her not to ring, she is to sit with Mrs. Gibbs, and late in the evening she slips down-stairs, opens a door, standing behind it. She recognizes the voices of Lesard and Brookes and later the latter calls "All clear."

CHAPTER XI.

"I'LL HAVE NO MORE OF HIM."

IN her stocking feet the girl crept after the man she had loved. But as she drew aside the curtain that hid the entrance to the lighted hall a sudden terror came on her. She dared not cross the bare, brilliant space between her and the smoking-room door, dared not even stand where she was, for fear of meeting those mocking, leering eyes of Lesard's, as she had met them the night of the masked ball.

In wild panic, she ran back to her refuge under the stairs, to get her breath and think what she must do.

She felt certain that Lesard had come to carry away those stolen jewels; and she must, somehow, keep track of him.

It was useless to try to overhear anything at the smoking-room door, even if she dared cross the hall, where there was nothing to hide her.

What a fool she had been not to open the door earlier, and get under one of the huge lounges in the smoking-room! Yet if she had, the footman would have undone her work. Helpless, angry tears came into her eyes—were all her plans, her watching, to come to nothing?

A step, a flash of keen, white light, startled her. Someone, carrying a lantern, had entered the dark passage!

It was all three of them, Marchmont, Lesard, the butler; the pitiless rays of the acetylene lamp in Marchmont's hand seemed to be full on her. Surely they were not so mad as to go out in the dead of night with a light like that, with a detective from London they knew not where!

Her own safety lay in the very brightness of the light, that made impenetrably dark the shadow where she crouched. The men passed her, Lesard with his hands in his coat pocket. And at the outline of his figure in the piercing light Jacky caught her breath.

He was not taking away the jewels, but bringing them! She could see through his coat the bulging of the belt where he carried them.

Marchmont opened a door that led to the kitchens.

"Yes," he said, with smooth delight at his own daring, "I had the fellow to dinner! We talked of the robbery thoroughly. He is going to investigate every suspicious place in the neighborhood, for the inspector is certain the jewels never reached London. So I thought it was time for them to come here!"

The neighbors don't know about it?—the place, I mean!" asked Lesard, with a curious laugh.

"They? No! Tom Hamilton swore no one knew out of the family, and they had grown to think it a fairy-tale. But it—isn't!" he laughed in his turn. "Come on, Lesard! You've got to be out of this before morning."

"Don't worry about me," calmly. "I can go out the other way, and take my time."

"In the dark!" sneeringly.

"Perhaps you'll tell me when it's ever daylight down there!" He flung back his head and laughed as only Lesard could. At the low, rich note of it Marchmont raised a quick hand.

"Do you want to wake that girl up-stairs?" he whispered angrily. "Come on!"

"The girl? Oh, no!" Jacky, kneeling in the shadow, saw his face harden savagely. "Go on, and show me your dog-hole."

He followed the other with his queer, noiseless step, that was so long and free. And as close at his heels as she dared came the girl who had loved him.

The passage went round sharp turns, it was easy enough to keep out of sight, but Lesard had good ears. She gathered her satin skirts to her knees that they might not rustle.

Where were they going? They had passed the deserted kitchen, the servants' hall; surely there was nowhere else! She paused and listened.

They had stopped just in front of her; she could hear them as they stood talking in whispers while a key grated in a lock.

The wine-cellar! Of course; there could be no safer place, since no one but the butler or his master ever went there.

"If I only knew what it was like ahead," she thought passionately, "I could go after them. But I might walk straight on to them. Even now if one of them turned back I'd be caught."

For there was nothing on each side of her but the bare stone walls of a long passage that slanted downward to the door where the men were standing.

But an unmistakable sound gave her courage.

A door swung back on creaky hinges, and then came the tread of men going down-stairs. The girl waited till the sounds ceased before she stole forward.

It was dark at the stairhead; far below she saw the sharp light of the lantern, and by that gleam crept her way down-stairs as far as she dared.

Suddenly the light brightened, spread out. She saw before her a huge cellar, running off apparently without limit. It was stone, damp and cold, full of casks and wine-bins; at the farther end, to which the men were making their leisurely way, she could see nothing but a dark wall. Yet it was to that dark, blank wall they were going, with never a glance behind them.

Jacky moved quickly to the shelter of a cask, her heart in her mouth at her own footsteps. Yet they must have been noiseless, for not even Lesard turned his head.

More wine-bins were plain now where the men had stopped. She saw Lesard stoop, and with an easy, effortless strength that was pretty to see, move a great bin bodily away from the wall. All three men disappeared behind it, and then came a silence full of quick, hard breathing, as if Lesard were working at something too heavy for him.

The dull thud of carefully-eased stone lowered on the stone floor startled her. If they were going to bury the jewels under that stone she might as well get away at once. Not Jacky Hamilton, nor the ten like her, could move that stone as they had done. She began to creep away, back to the stairs, a sudden vicious purpose of betraying Marchmont to the London detective making her quiver. Come what might, she would get Gillian safely away; get those wretched diamonds back to Mrs. Fareham.

But at the very stairfoot she stopped short. The great cellar was getting pitch-dark. The men carrying the light had gone—where? She turned sharply, and could see the place where they had stood only by a gleam that grew less each instant.

"I've got to see where they've gone!" she thought desperately, and without a care for her own danger, ran lightly across the cellar, just in time. For when she reached the wine-bin that had been moved the darkness was like the grave. Black, inpenetrable, thick, it seemed like a solid wall, and the terror of it made the girl's heart thump.

Had they moved a stone from the floor or from the wall? She dared not take a step lest she should fall bodily into some dreadful depth through an opening in the floor. Kneeling down, she felt each inch of the floor round her; it was solid as bedrock. As she fumbled she struck her hand hard against a slab of stone that leaned against the wall; the next instant she laughed. For in front of her, in the wall, was the opening the stone had filled, and a damp, cold wind came from it to her burning cheeks.

With a terror of what she was going to do that shook her like a leaf, Jacky Hamilton crept into that black opening with nothing to guide her but her hand on a stone wall that was cold as death, slimy with festering mold.

Step by step, feeling the floor cautiously, not daring to take her hand from the cold, unnameable horror of the wall, she went forward.

She was in a passage which slanted steadily downward, but whether it was wide or narrow she could not tell.

A strange noise that she knew, yet could not name, reached her as she felt her way, sick with terror, yet her face hard-set and grim as Lesard's own. Nothing except death could stop Jacky Hamilton now—and death she would not think of lest her trembling knees should fail her utterly. And the queer, liquid rumbling kept growing louder, more insistent, closer. Suddenly she stopped, her head swimming, her spirit quailing in her for very horror.

The passage had taken a long curve; she was round it now and could see the light not fifty yards ahead; could see the three men standing round a heap of slimy stones in a curious round cellar. But it was not that which made her blood like ice in her body; not that which turned her faint. She knew that familiar, yet strange, noise, now.

For she could see that the passage down which she had come had but one wall, the one she had followed; and to that dark, slimy wall she owed her life. The sloping, slippery footway was not three feet wide, and on the side away from the wall rolled an angry black stream. The roof sloped down to its other side, and she had been near to the brink of the black, wicked water time and again.

It took all her strength to turn her eyes from the fascination of the sullen, rolling stream; but turn them she must and did, for drowning was not the only peril that was at her elbow.

She was just in time. Marchmont had moved away some of the loose stones that lay so naturally on the rough-hewn stone floor of the queer place. Lesard, his coat unfastened, was laying his canvas belt into the hiding place left uncovered.

Life and determination came back with a leap to the girl looking on. If she were to get out alive she must go now; in a few minutes they would be on her. She paused one minute to see Marchmont stoop and take something from the canvas belt with a laugh that echoed above the rush of the dreadful water at her side. What he took she could not see, and she dared not wait another instant.

Clinging to the wall—that would have sickened her to touch could she have seen it!—step by step she crept back, in dread of the one slip that might send her dead body whirling past the men beyond. More dead than alive she gained the entrance to that awful passage. Her hand was bleeding, she could feel the hot, wet stickiness of it, and she wrapped it in her skirt that it should leave no telltale marks on casks or bins as she groped past them in her search for the cellar stairs in darkness that felt like a weight on her eyes.

Was she going straight? Would she ever find the stairs?

It was impossible to tell, since even a familiar room in utter darkness is a place to get lost in. Great drops were on her forehead as she blundered on her desperate way, her unhurt hand held out before her lest she should fall against a bin. She looked behind her in a voiceless agony that Marchmont might be coming with his light and see her circling round in the big cellar, dazed, at his mercy.

Thank Heaven, there was no light yet! Only a faint, faint gleam, a hum of angry voices. They were stopping to talk in that awful passage—and oh! whereabouts in that huge cellar was she?

As she watched the gleam, it brightened.

Jacky drew her breath and caught her last courage to meet them—and what they might do. But even at that she would not give up. She stared round her into the pitiless gloom and could make out no sign of the stairway. As she stared she gave a frightened gasp. Did something flash in front of her, like a match suddenly lit and extinguished?—or was it a trick of her eyes in the unutterable blackness of the vault?

What it was she was too helpless to care. Nothing could be worse than to be caught like a rat in this dreadful place. With her last strength the girl gathered herself together and ran desperately to that half-seen gleam that had been gone on the very instant.

She blundered wildly against casks; twice all but fell; and each second she was aware that the light was growing behind her like a living thing that haunted her. The sound of men's feet echoing from the hidden passage was growing plain. Her breast rasped in her panting chest. There were only two things before her if she could not reach the stairway in time—to be caught, or to hide behind a cask while the men went away and be locked in to starve.

With a staggering run she moved on, she knew not where. Something caught her ankle, and she fell headlong on the floor. For a moment she could not move. Then she almost screamed with fear.

A hand, a human hand, was on her arm, dragging her to her feet; a voice was whispering in her ear; and the light behind was brightening till in a moment it would be on her.

"Quick, quick!" said the voice sharply, yet low with caution, and Jacky felt herself pulled to the stair.

Oh, if she only knew whose fingers were on her arm! Her heart seemed to die in her breast.

"Come," said a voice she had not known at first, so hoarse and changed was it with terror, "be quick! We must get up before them."

"Gill!" Relief made Jacky suddenly weak; she sank down where she was, a few steps up the stairs.

"Yes. Come on, hurry! They will hear us." As she stooped and put her arms around Jacky her whole body trembled with the hard drawing of her breath. But her very presence gave the younger sister new strength. Hand in hand they stole up the stairs, not daring to whisper, even, for the light was following them. Alas! it only made the gloom in front of them more hopeless!

Gill looked ahead at the gleam at the foot of the stairs; then forward, and was staggered at the darkness, the unfamiliar passages that lay ahead of them.

"I've a candle," she breathed, "but I daren't light it. They're too near."

For there were footsteps on the stairs now; at the head, where they stood, the lantern light all but reached them, like a long, malicious finger pointing to its prey.

Desperate, the girls fled along the passages, and darted into the first open doorway they could feel. On their knees they crouched.

Jacky caught Gillian's hand hard as they listened. There were only two pair of footsteps approaching. Neither of them was Lesard's. Where was he? She peered through the crack of the sheltering door and drew back swiftly. Marchmont and his butler had paused outside. Did they suspect anything? Or were they only waiting for Lesard?

The servant's oddly well-bred voice reached to the listeners.

"I tell you I don't trust him," he said, not by a long way. What made you come out the other way? It was mad." He held the lantern angrily, so that Jacky trembled for the scrap of Gillian's skirt might show in the waiting light. But she dared not so much as turn her head to look.

Marchmont's answer came clear in its scorn. "If he likes to risk his neck, let him," he turned, significantly. "There'd be one less. What else are you afraid of?"

"Well, you're a cold-blooded devil," the voice came, after a pause. "But you're right. He won't make any mistake; he can't afford to fish."

"Then what ails you?"

"I tell you I don't trust him! What prevent his going off with the whole thing back that way some night and didn't like his manner today. He was too reckless and high and mighty."

"Tell me how to do without him. The master's accent was as precise as just as his toilet was utterly unruffled night expedition, while Brookes' was a slime and dust—but it changed now to brutality that startled all three hearers.

"You talk nonsense about getting him way," he said slowly. "Not even Lesard it. And as for taking the stuff, he can know too much for Lesard—or you—games. Do you understand?"

The lantern shook in the man's hand.

"I know," he said sullenly; "I don't."

"See that you don't, then!" he moved on.

As their footsteps died away they turned to each other in the dark.

"What does he mean by the other lian whispered. "Is there another dollar? What were they doing down did you know about it?"

"Mrs. Gibbs told me to open the the butler and someone else. She ache. I saw them all going to the it was something about the jewels them."

"And you never told me?" She son, and it cut her to the heart not trust her to fight against Lesard. You might have."

"I was afraid, Gill!"

Gillian sobbed in the dark.

"You were right," she said, choking grimly. "But yet—I fought for you

Cold corn-meal mush is also Mix and season with one tablespoon of butter, a little pepper, and salt unless eat and cereal are already salted. A pinch ltry dressing may be added. Add just enough gravy to hold the meat and cereal together if any additional moisture is necessary. Make into small round cakes about half an inch thick. Wrap in thin strips of bacon and fasten with wooden toothpicks or tie with a clean white string. Bake in a hot oven until the bacon is brown, turning the cakes once.

SCALLOPED PORK AND MUSH.—Chop cold roast pork quite fine and place in a deep baking dish in alternate layers with corn-meal mush, sprinkling each layer of pork with a small pinch of ground sage and a little salt and pepper. Have the top layer of mush. Add roast pork gravy. Many like this dish with a little stewed tomato added to each layer. Bake in a moderate oven one hour.

SCALLOPED HOMINY.—Put an inch layer of cold boiled hominy into a baking dish, sprinkle with grated cheese and season with salt, paprika, and a tiny pinch of mustard, or the mustard may be omitted. HOMINY AND TOMATOES.—Cook one cup of hominy two hours and pour into a deep baking dish. Pour over the top about an inch layer of tomato that has been strained and cooked down about one-half. Sprinkle with cheese and butter, salt and paprika and bake 30 minutes in a fairly hot oven.

RICE.—Leftover boiled rice mixed with white sauce and beaten up with grated cheese may be baked until brown and served with cold meat.

BAKED BEAN SALAD.—Two cups of cold baked beans which have been cooked until the juice is quite thick. Mix with one tablespoon of scraped onion, two tablespoons of chopped sour pickle, one-half cup of crisp shredded cabbage. Season with salt and pepper and pour two tablespoons of salad oil over the top.

BAKED BEAN LOAF.—Two cups of cold baked beans put through the potato masher. Add one cup of fine bread-crumbs, two or more cold boiled onions mashed, one-fourth cup of thick stewed tomato, salt and pepper, and one well-beaten egg. Stir well together, press into a baking dish, lay slices of bacon over the top and bake one hour in a moderate oven. A little cold carrot or beet may be added to the loaf.

VEGETABLE PIE.—Prepare the boiled dinner vegetables the same as for hash and fill a deep baking dish about three-fourths full. Add a few tablespoons from the "top-of-the-pot" to moisten, or a little beef gravy you may have on hand. Cover with a rich biscuit dough a little less than an inch thick. Bake in a hot oven until the crust is thoroughly baked. Serve with apple sauce.

GRAVY FOR LEFTOVER MEATS.—Slice two small onions, add two sprigs of parsley, half a bay leaf and the leaves from a piece of celery. Cover with water and boil one hour. Strain. Add about one-fourth teaspoon of prepared table mustard and one tablespoon of meat fat. Put one tablespoon of meat fat in a saucepan and when it bubbles smooth in one tablespoon of flour. Cook one minute while stirring, then add the liquor and cook five minutes.

Possibilities in Small Amounts

It is often a mistake to continue serving a leftover until the eye as well as the taste refuses to be attracted by it. This may apply to a dish of cold meat that has been sliced, and through continuous efforts to get it eaten had time to dry and curl. Or it may be pieces of dried cake, broken and covered with loose crumbs. A little stale apple sauce making its appearance until everyone shuns it is likely to cause some member of the family to "sour" on apple sauce for years to come. Fish should always be made into a palatable dish and finished on the second day. It may not become tainted by the third day, but it will develop a "fishy" odor that is apt to result in turning the family against this valuable food.

The "don'ts" are endless regarding the use of stale food, but perhaps the most serious objection to such practice is that it reduces the variety of foods the housewife can serve and be sure of getting eaten. There are endless ways of using cold meat. Leftover slices should be reheated in gravy, chopped for hash or made into a scallop. For families who eat too heavily of meat, these dishes made from meat and vegetables combined have an advantage outside using the leftovers. Dried cake is made into a "bread" pudding with very little labor, and with a bit of inventiveness a new dessert is the result. Add that cup of stale apple sauce to your meat or fish stuffing and then "taste and see." Pick your cold fish into bits and reheat in the egg sauce, or lacking the egg use it in a cracker and milk escallop on fish-cakes. If the family seems to be slighting the fish-cakes, next time try adding a little chopped boiled beet as this makes it into a new dish.

Bits of dried cheese should be soaked in a little cream, then beaten into a paste flavored with salt, paprika, and a pinch of mustard. Or it may be softened with mayonnaise. Serve on toasted crackers or fill the grooves of tender stalks of celery.

All the cold vegetables make into delicious sal-

Cubby Bear's New Year Calls

By Lena B. Ellingw

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"WAKE up, Cubby Bear! The old year is ending!" said Mamma Bruin.

The words reached Cubby's mind dimly, through his sound winter sleep. He stirred, opened one eye drowsily, and would have been fast asleep again in another instant, had not Mamma Bruin gently shaken him.

"Is the New Year coming?" he asked. "I am glad." And he crawled out of bed and stretched his drowsy limbs.

In the fall, when the time for their winter sleep was near, Cubby had heard Wise Owl and Redtop Woodpecker talking about New Year calls, and had said to Mamma Bruin:

"Why must we always be asleep when the New Year begins? I have never, never made any New Year calls! How could I manage to wake when the old year is ending?"

"Why, if you care so much about it, Cubby Bear, I will call you," promised Mamma Bruin. "If I set my mind on waking at a certain time, I always do it. But you must promise me to go back to bed and to sleep as soon as your calls are ended."

"Oh, yes; I promise," agreed Cubby Bear. "And, Mamma Bruin, I have thought of the loveliest plan—but I could not do it without your help."

"What is it?"

"I would like to take a plum pudding to each place where I call. Little round, brown plum puddings," he explained, with shining eyes, "each with a pretty pine-tassel stuck in the top! Could I?"

"Yes," said Mamma Bruin, "I will help you."

And now the time had come.

Mamma Bruin had a brisk fire started, and Cubby held out his little dark paws to the cheery blaze. He felt rather heavy and stupid, much more like going back to his little bed than making calls.

Mamma Bruin was mixing the puddings.

"You must bring in some snow, and melt it in the kettle," she told Cubby, "so we can boil the puddings."

They spent the rest of the night in the warm little kitchen, putting wood on the fire to keep the kettle boiling, and telling stories to keep themselves awake.

Then, when the little round, brown puddings were done, they put each one into a birchbark cup, stuck a pine-tassel in the top, and placed them carefully in a basket. Such a festive sight!

They had made one extra one, and this they broke in two, and each ate half.

"They taste as good as they look," decided Mamma Bruin. "Now, Cubby, a Happy New Year to you!"

So saying, she went gladly back to finish her long sleep.

Cubby put on his best necktie, green, with yellow and purple spots, his red earmuffs and mittens to keep him warm, and, carefully carrying the basket which held the puddings, started out in the grayness of the winter morning to make his New Year calls.

"I am afraid I have started too early," he thought. "I will call on Mr. Wise Owl first. He stays up at night, and perhaps he has not gone to bed yet for the day."

To Mr. Wise Owl's hollow tree he went, and knocked.

Soon a gray ear and large eye appeared. Then Wise Owl hurried forth.

"Whoo-whoo!" he cried, with pleasure and surprise in his voice. "Whoo ever thought of seeing you out today?"

"I have come," said Cubby Bear politely, "to make a call, to wish you a Happy New Year, and to give you one of my fat little puddings."

"This is kind, indeed!" said Wise Owl, as he shook Cubby's paw. "If you will excuse me, I will eat a little of the pudding now. It is a hard winter, and food is not too plentiful. I will hang the pine-tassel on my wall, where it will remind me of you."

After talking with Wise Owl a while, Cubby started on again. By this time the world looked more cheerful, for the bright sun was just lifting his smiling face above the mountain.

Wading along through the snow, he heard a loud tap, tap, tapping on the bark of a tree.

"Someone else must be making New Year calls," thought Cubby. Then he spied Redtop Woodpecker, and called to him, "Whom are you calling on, Redtop?"

"Nobody," answered the bird, and came fluttering down to where Cubby stood. "I am trying to find some worms to eat."

"I can give you something better than worms for a New Year's feast," Cubby told him. "See if you can find Billy Bluejay anywhere around. I will wait here for you."

Cubby stamped around to keep his feet warm while he waited.

"I HAVE COME," SAID CUBBY, TO MAKE A CALL, TO WISH YOU A HAPPY NEW YEAR, AND TO GIVE YOU ONE OF MY FAT LITTLE PUDDINGS."

When Redtop came flying back, both Billy Bluejay and little Chickadee Chirrupee were with him.

"How do you do?" asked Cubby, bowing in his best manner. "I have come to make a call, to wish you all a Happy New Year, and to give you one of my fat little puddings."

"Oh, beautiful!" cried Billy Bluejay. "Hurry up, you Redtop and Dee-dee, if you want to get your share, for I am hungry!"

Cubby watched them happily as they ate.

"I will go to Bunny Rabbit's next," he decided.

Bunny Rabbit, delighted to see Cubby Bear, invited him in. Cubby took one pudding into the house, leaving the others, in the basket, on the doorstep.

"I have come," said Cubby, "to make a call, to wish you a Happy New Year, and to give you one of my fat little puddings."

"Oh, thank you," said Bunny Rabbit.

"Oh, thank you," echoed the Bunny Babies, and all stared at the pudding longingly, their eyes big and round, their little pink noses wiggling as they sniffed.

A New Year!—new days, new thoughts, new beginnings, for all of us! Our faces turn toward 1923 with few glances backward at the discarded twelve months. Man is an eternal Looker Forward, and Youth, with all the more before it, gazes the farthest and the most eagerly into the beckoning future. "Well, we'll see what 1923 has in store for us," is what we find it easiest to think and say.

We say this, most of us, because we are filled with the pleasant illusion that the year may bring us something or all that we crave—wealth, love, happiness, peace, and other bright gifts. But when we think more deeply, we find that these good things are not in the keeping of this or any other year, that we ourselves can be the only bringers of these joyful qualifications of life. It is in us that the future lies and that the past will be. We are the makers of every one of our sorrows and joys; the builders of our own dreams and achievements; the destroyers of our hopes, and the tearers-down of our own half-begun houses of life.

In all the busy, complex and external ways in which we live today, it is too easy and seems almost necessary to fall into ways of thinking in which we look to external and future things to give us what we seek. We have not found what we desire in the past years, and so we look to see each new year lay gifts at our feet. But if we think thus, we look in vain; not gifts, but renewed illusions is what the New Year is pretty certain to bring us. Instead of gifts laid at our waiting feet, it is disappointments which probably will be treading on our toes—already sore from other past crushing of events.

For in the many or few years put behind us, if we have not builded within us the qualities that make for happiness, we will look vainly for a Happy New Year. We must bring what we ask and hope for. If it is friends we seek, the year cannot give them unless we have learned to be friendly to others. If it is love we desire, we must have learned to love and to make ourselves worth loving. If it is joy we wish, we must have found how to be bringers of joy to others and how to live with the corners of our lips turned up. And finally, if it is wealth we want—that ever-sought Pot of Gold at the foot of Life's Rainbow—then we must have been somehow taught the hardest lesson of all: that gain comes best by giving, and that riches are too dearly bought if they are won by the impoverishment of the heart.

These are all but suggestions of laws dealing with the inner life of man—his only real life. They form no part of the materialist's creed of success. They do not seem as real in returns as the crashing, cashing life of trade or the noisy many-footed search for pleasure which is trampling down the world. Yet they are inklings of the surest, truest laws and gleams of the only realities—the more substantial because they are not a structure of conduct built by man, but one that was builded for him. In their simple completeness these laws underlie all else. They are the key to every system of religion. They will see mountains wear away and seas retire through all New Years, for they are the laws of the Government of God which must finally be the government of our creation.

For man is here to make his world; it never makes him. Out of the heart of man are all the issues of life—and by "heart" I mean his inner laws of impulse and feeling. It is this inner life which must be builded, guarded and fed if we are to have any Happy New Years—or anything else which is enduringly happy.

Although in my best moments these simple truths, of which I speak but parts, seem so simple and true to me, I know they too easily seem foolishment to others, a delay and a stumbling-block to what is termed success as the world lives. Youth, looking eagerly ahead and seldom within, pushes such thoughts carelessly aside. Age, having failed to find or understand them, believes the following of new paths too late or too seemingly impossible.

But in watching life around us, in reading the columns of our crime-and horror-filled newspapers, we can see examples of how these laws of the heart of man work out. Before us is the evidence of how any d struction or emptiness of the inner life finds a sure following of an outer destruction, of a crumbling to sorrow, suffering and death of all those things which have been piled up as possessions or of the fame given by men. A man's life may have for years made a fine and showy seeming before the world, but an inner emptiness and rot have been increasing—and suddenly the great fall comes, or perhaps the slow decay of unhappinss goes on. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," which means that as he thinks within, so will his future be and the lines of his life be for good or for evil. We make our new and old years. We must take thought to make them right.

So in all this I want you to know that when you look forward to 1923, you must look within also. All the prosperity and happiness we can ask of the New Year we can only make within ourselves and only receive the gifts we have made ourselves ready for receiving. As we have, so it may be given to us. A Happy New Year will surely come to happy full hearts, and to this sort of heart only. The most prosperous New Year will be theirs only whose wishes are sincerely for the prosperity of others and not for themselves. These are the things I believe. I want you to believe them, too. It is hard doctrine, perhaps; but, oh, so true when put in practice. Try it and find out! As for our Happy Bunch, I know many of "em are already proving how these things work out in daily living. To others we can say: Come and see and be happy with us—this year and every future one!

Let's all work for a Happy New Year and a Happy Heart. Let's look for Love and not for Luck to work wonders. Let's all turn to 1923 with a smile and an outstretched hand. And the Young and Friendly Year will smile back, take our hand, and give us more than we have hoped or asked.

Bill says his idea of a happy New Year would be a mild January when he could throw every liniment bottle out of the window and walk on four legs and not three. That three inches of snow we had last week put a crimp and a limp in Bill's holidays. I am going to make him read twice over what I have written here. I know he needs it and that some lessons are better than liniment for lame hearts and legs.

And now for the letters:

UNION, SOUTH CAROLINA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Some time ago you made the statement that romance does not exist in real life and this letter is being written to prove it, and that you, Uncle Lisha, are responsible for some of it. Anyway you were for ours: Perhaps you and some of the cousins remember Ruth Miller, R. F. D. 2, Asheboro, N. C., whose letter was printed in our department of COMFORT, July, 1921. After it was published, letters and letters and letters were sent to the above address, so many they could not be answered. But there was one, from a rural mail carrier in Michigan, that seemed different from the others. The letter was answered and Uncle Sam's postal employees between Michigan and North Carolina were kept pretty busy handling letters after that. The result is that he secured a transfer from rural carrier in Coldwater, Michigan, to postal clerk in Union, South Carolina,—all for the sake of one little southern girl. And that's all, except that August 23, 1922, the North and South, as represented by a northern man and a southern girl, were again united. You have been a fairy godmother—or rather godfather—to us, Uncle Lisha, for you brought us together, and we wanted you to know how happy you have made two COMFORT readers. You have the heartfelt gratitude, highest esteem, and the very best of all good wishes of

Your loving nephew and niece,
MR. AND MRS. CARROLL I. CHASE.

Talk about laughing and cooing, Carrol and Ruth, I certainly gurgled with joy when I read your letter and found that COMFORT and I had a share in building your happiness and making you something nearer and dearer than cousins. Yep, there is a lot of romance in real life that never gets into the movies or between the covers of "best sellers." And a good thing for us it is that this is so and that we do not have to take our dreams second-hand. But there is a little of magic about romance—you must believe in it if it is to happen. Here, as in all things, faith counts for much. Ruth, I'll wager there was a good streak of romance in your heart when you wrote your letter to COMFORT and when you read the replies—and the one that "seemed different." And Carroll felt the same when he sent his letter to you and romance radios commenced to vibrate from Michigan to South Carolina. And now it has all come true! What more appropriate place for such a Union than your town, Ruth?

I'm writing this with every hope for your deepest, dearest and most enduring happiness, and with thanks for your own kind wishes and the proof you send that romance is just as real as we make it and just as enduring as life. Carroll and Ruth, I'm a happy fairy goduncle this day, believe me.

MT. PLEASANT, 805 N. LINCOLN ST., IOWA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I wonder if any of the cousins can give me the words of the poem, "In the Land of Beginning Again"? The first verse is:

"I wish there were some beautiful place
Called the Land of Beginning Again,
Where all our mistakes, and all our heartaches
And all our poor foolish pain
Might be dropped like a shaggy old cloak at the door—
And never put on again."

Sincerely, ALICE LYNELORD.

Alice, it is no wonder you are interested in the Land of Beginning Again. That would be a country worth finding. No Central Africa, farthest North or uncharted Antarctic would offer such charms and rewards to the explorer. Not only poets, but oodles and oodles of quite ordinary folks have tried their hands at this discovery game in vain. The best that remains is but to write about the fair, far, unattainable domain.

No, Alice, we can never turn back the hands on the Clock of Life. We cannot start our Life's day over again. We are pitifully unable to interfere with the beginnings we may have made on the hours of Time's allotment. I fear the only things we sometimes start over again are our old mistakes—for we are such sorry learners and rememberers! And so we must be careful to begin as rightly as possible, that we may have the less sad wishes later on, the less of seeking for unfindable turnings back. When dreams go aground they are too fragile for much worthwhile salvaging.

Alice, a poem like the one you quote is sure to be popular, for its appeal is as universal as life. It voices the cry of disappointed hearts, broken hopes, unsatisfied longings for things more whole and perfect than our own uneven lives and unsteady souls can gain for ourselves. The poet who pens such lines is sure of a high place in every Scrap Book Anthology, no matter how the highbrow critics may rank his or her muse. As it happens, Alice, I can help you about this poem. It is by Louisa Fletcher (Mrs. Willard Connely), and was first published in 1911. A book of Mrs. Connely's verse is published, under the title of "The Land of Beginning Again," by Small, Maynard & Co,, Boston, Mass. So you may find the poem there, if none of the cousins produces it from a scrap-book—as I am quite sure will be done.

CARUTHERSVILLE, MISSOURI.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I'm sincerely glad that you love Missouri, Uncle Lisha,—at least I judge that you do from all the kind remarks I've read in the Cousins' department. But I'm sure you've never seen southeast Missouri, generally known as "swamp-east Missouri." Although this name was at one time an appropriate honest description, it desires to be no longer known as such, for it has now been dredged and grows the finest crops, equal to any in the U. S., without commercial fertilizer of any kind.

This section has a wonderful history: When the Indians roamed the country, the spot where Caruthersville now stands was one of the landings on the Mississippi River and a ridge running west from here, known as Morgan's Ridge, was never known to overflow. Now our levee prevents any overflows. There are quite a number of Indian mounds in Pemiscot County. Various kinds of pottery have been dug from one which is about two miles southwest of the town.

Then there was the earthquake of 1812. That was an exciting time for the settlers. The Mississippi ran upstream Some of the highest land sank, causing great lakes and bayous to form. The lakes have been dredged and drained, but they say there is a place in one beautiful bayou where no bottom has ever been found. The largest lake was more than ten miles long. Big walnut timber, nearly eight feet in diameter, has been dug from the bed of the lake, sure proof of its once having been high ground. Thousands of walnut logs were burned in heaps during the clearing of the country. Then game was abundant. Deer, bear, elk, wolves, squirrels, ducks, geese, pelicans and turkey made it a hunter's dream—but times have rapidly changed.

There are now scarcely any swamp. Ditches eight to 25 feet deep have been dug all over the low ground. An aviator flying over our section landed and asked about our "canals." He thought we had a wonderful system for the transportation of our products!

Where lakes once produced 80-pound fish, corn now grows to the enormous height of 30 feet and pumpkins to the weight of 118 pounds. Alfalfa and clover make from four to six and sometimes seven cuttings a season, producing a ton and a half to the acre at each cutting. A farmer living in the Arkansas cotton country visited in our county and wants to rent 1,000 acres to plant to cotton—he says 35 acres here will produce more than his 1,400 acres where he now lives.

I live on a small farm on the edge of the town and we raise fruit mostly. We have received the blue ribbon on our pears at the fair for many years. We have raised pears weighing two and three-quarters pounds each. Some of our pears went to the San Francisco Exposition.

So when dear Billy the Goat gets hungry won't you please send him to our part of Missouri? Hay is a much-better diet than paper, although we once had a cow that would leave hay for paper. Once she ate a whole barrel of paper and while we owned her she ate quite a lot of clothes and a section of heavy Brussels carpet.

Enclosed you will find valuable(?) works of art—one of Bill and one of Uncle Charlie. Of course if you, Uncle Lisha, will some day pose beside the picture of Uncle Charlie, I will do one of you. I always desired to be an artist or an illustrator for stories, but never got the chance except as a pastime. I enjoy other things besides drawing. The letters of the cousins and those in the Sisters' Corner seem almost like personal letters to oneself. You see I, having no uncles, aunts nor cousins, want to adopt some, and COMFORT is a recommended source of supply. I was afraid many would never visit me and so I have given you, one and all, as pleasant a time as I could by taking you through my country, over its paved streets and tarvia roads, in the easy way of history and description. I would especially like to hear from any of the Stephens family or descndants who live in or near Raleigh, N. C., as my grandfather came from that state. Also would like letters from the Grubbs family of Kentucky and Illinois.

I am, sincerely,

Your southern Democratic cousin,
ZULA STEPHENS.

It is true, Zula, that in all my Missouri-loving, mule-hunting rambles among the Ozarks, I never ran across your little corner of "swamp-east Missouri" which sticks like a moist thumb into the sides of Arkansas and Tennessee. And I'm sorry now I never put on my boots and waded down into your land of 118-pound pumpkins and pears. I should like to own a farm on the shores of Grassy Bayou or on the outskirts of the thriving town of Cooter. With a giant pear or two, what ducks I could shoot, and all my winter's wood to be cut from the bottom of the lakes, I could live comfortably the year 'round and let the cruel Brooklyn landlords starve among their empty apartments. But how about overflows, Zula? Are the levees good at Grassy Bayou? And I would not want to have it so grassy that I would have to take too much time from duck hunting or pear peeling to mow my lawn. I must know about these things before I move.

Zula, your "works of art" were artfully done and won a spot in Bill's Album if not in his hardened heart. He did not like your comparing him to a cow or suggesting that he might eat Brussels carpet. Bill would never touch anything less expensive than imported Axminster. I do hope you will make me into a work of art some day, Zula. A sort of "old master," you know, and giving me a halo or something. When the pears are ripe and the pumpkins yellowing, I'll come down to Pemiscot County and pose for you among the bayous—perhaps with a 118-pound mosquito munching on the south slope of my Roman nose.

VICKSBURG, KENTUCKY.

LOUISE CONN.

Your letter, Louise, is a dreadful example of how a typewriter will spell. If you had written to us with a fountain pen I'm sure the result would have been very different, even if less amusing. Some typewriters never were taught to spell!

No Excuse Now

For dingy film on teeth

A way has been found to combat film on teeth, and millions of people now use it.

A few years ago, nearly all teeth were coated more or less. Today those dingy coats are inexcusable. You can prove this by a pleasant ten-day test.

Film ruins teeth

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Then it forms the basis of dingy coats which hide the teeth's natural luster.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film. No ordinary tooth paste effectively combats it. So, despite all care, tooth troubles have been constantly increasing, and glistening teeth were rare.

New methods now

Dental science has now found two effective film combatants. Their action is to curdle film and then harmlessly remove it. Years of careful tests have amply proved their efficiency.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, based on modern research. These two film combatants are embodied in it for daily application. The name of that tooth paste is Pepsodent.

Dental authorities the world over now endorse this method. Leading dentists everywhere are urging its adoption.

Other new effects

Pepsodent also multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize acids which cause tooth decay.

Old-time tooth pastes, based on soap and chalk, had just opposite effects.

It polishes the teeth, so film adheres less easily.

Thus Pepsodent does, in five great ways, what never before was so successfully done.

Used the world over

Now careful people of fifty nations are using Pepsodent, largely by dental advice. You can see the results in lustrous teeth wherever you look today. To millions of people it has brought a new era in teeth cleaning.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

In one week you will realize that this method means new beauty, new protection for the teeth. Cut out the coupon now.

they have loved my prospective fortune more than they have loved me, the sooner I find it out the better. At all events, this calamity, if it can be so termed, will show me the true and the false."

"And you will not feel degraded to go out and earn your pittance, perhaps a dollar a day, with your own hands?"

"No. My hands may grow hard and rough with the toil, but my heart will be the same."

"Brownie Douglas, you are a splendid girl, and I love you a thousand times more at this moment than I ever did in my life before. I am prouder of you as a friend, prouder of you without a penny today, than I was yesterday when I thought you worth a million!" exclaimed Miss Huntington impulsively as she threw her arms around her friend and embraced her fervently.

This broke Brownie down completely, and she sobbed wildly for a few minutes.

"Dear Asia," she said at length, wiping her tears, "I thought surely, when you were talking about caste and the degradation of toil, that you were speaking your own thoughts. We have loved each other so well that the idea of losing your friendship was very painful to me."

"Forgive me if I for the moment pained you. I have read of people being above such feelings upon the loss of all their earthly goods, but I never believed it, and I was testing you. I truly prize you more in your misfortune than I ever did before. You have taught me a lesson today which I shall not soon forget. Your example toward the poor and unfortunate has always troubled my conscience, and henceforth I shall shorten my trains and extend my charities."

"I am glad to hear you say this, Asia, for you have the means at your command to do great good," replied Brownie, her face now radiant at this proof of true friendship.

"Well, but I'm afraid the lesson will not be lasting if you do not follow it up with others, and so, my darling, I am going to propose that you go home to stay with me. No, you needn't refuse," she continued, putting her hand playfully over Brownie's lips, "on the score of being dependent, for you know papa has plenty, and would never feel it in the world. He would be delighted, for he has always admired you intensely."

"Aspasia, I know it will hurt you deeply to have me refuse this kindness, but indeed it cannot be, dear. My mind has been made up from the first to earn my bread 'by the sweat of my brow,' and nothing can change it," Brownie answered decidedly.

"But if he desires you to come as a companion and a help to me?" urged Aspasia earnestly.

Brownie laughed aloud at the idea, in spite of her sadness.

"A companion, Aspasia, when your home is already full!"

"Well, but you know Jennie is soon to be married, and Lina needs someone to look after her French and music. You would be just the one, and we would have such delightful times together."

"It would be all a mere form. I know I should not be received or treated as a governess or companion in your father's house, and I should live a life of idleness and pleasure as much as heretofore. No; I have said I will work, and work I will! And if my friends prove themselves as true as you have, I shall only be so much happier," was the firm reply.

CHAPTER VII.

EARNING HER OWN LIVING.

It soon became noised abroad that Miss Meta Douglas, the heiress, was no more than any other common mortal, since her wealth had taken to itself wings and flown away.

It seemed as if her heart must break when, as the last day before the sale came, she went from room to room to take a farewell view of everything, and gather up the few precious treasures which Mr. Conrad had told her she was at liberty to take. Aspasia had insisted upon remaining with her until everything was over, and donning a simple calico dress, minus either ruffle or train, she superintended with her own fair hands the packing of valuable books, statuettes, bronzes and ornaments, which she knew were so dear to Brownie's tender heart.

And when at length the last day arrived, early in the morning before even the servants were astir, she had slipped down-stairs and, moving noiselessly from room to room, had tucked a card bearing the words "sold" upon several of the finest paintings, which she knew Miss Mehetabel had highly prized from the fact of their having been brought over from the old country.

Her father had given her permission and carte blanche to perform this delicate service for her friend.

But it was all over at last.

Everything was sold, and the house was left bare and desolate.

Aspasia had gone and Brownie was alone.

The debts were all paid, also the bequests to the servants, which Brownie had insisted upon, although strongly urged to invest the money for herself.

Mr. Conrad was obliged to do her bidding, and then, with a sigh of despair, placed two hundred dollars, all that remained of a fortune of a million, in her little hands.

"Why, I feel quite rich!" she exclaimed merrily as, after counting it over, she looked up and saw his quivering lip.

With a mighty effort he swallowed the sobs which nearly broke forth and managed to say:

"Now, my dear child, you will come home with me for a while. Mrs. Conrad desires it, and Emily is lonely."

"Thank you, dear Mr. Conrad, I cannot, as I have promised to be in New York tomorrow morning," she answered, with an air of business which would have amused him had not his heart been so full.

"In New York tomorrow morning!" he ejaculated in astonishment.

"Yes, I have an engagement there."

"An engagement? May I ask of what nature?" and he felt hurt that she had not consulted him regarding her movements for the future.

"Certainly. I saw an advertisement a week ago for one hundred girls to work on fancy straws. I have always been bewitched over fancy-straw work, so I wrote, asking for a situation."

"But you have no friends there, and where will you make your home?" he asked in dismay, yet admiring the resolution expressed in her bright eye and flushed face.

"There is a boarding-house connected with the establishment for the accommodation of those who work in the factory and I shall board there for the present."

And thus it ended as Brownie decreed. He bade her farewell as she took her seat in the train that was to bear her away, feeling worse than any condemned criminal who had been sentenced to hard labor for life, for she must go forth unprotected into the world to earn the bread she ate, and he was utterly powerless to prevent it.

* * * * * *

Never was there a more lonely or heart-sick girl than Brownie Douglas when she entered the office of Ware & Coolidge the next morning and presented her card and the letter she had received from them engaging her to come into their employ.

"Do you wish to see anyone, miss?" asked a clerk as she entered the office and bestowing a bold stare of admiration upon her lovely face.

"I wish to see Mr. Coolidge, if you please," Brownie answered with cold dignity, yet a hot flush arose to her cheek at his look and manner.

"Ah, yes, certainly. Walk this way," and the dandy led her into an inner office, where a man of about forty-five sat reading his paper.

"Mr. Coolidge, a young lady to see you, sir," the young man said, and with another insolent stare bowed himself out.

The gentleman immediately came forward, and Brownie gave him her card and the letter.

"Ah, yes, Miss Meta Douglas," he said pleasantly, reading the name, while his quick eye ran over her dainty figure from head to foot, taking in her beauty and expensive apparel at a glance. "You understand the business, I suppose. What department would you prefer to work in?"

"No, sir, I know nothing whatever about the business; I have come to learn," she answered frankly and simply.

The gentleman gave her a look of surprise, then a smile of amusement curled his lips.

"My dear young lady," he said, a trifle embarrassed, "there is some mistake about this. We never employ any but experienced hands. The fall work is coming on rapidly and we need those who can go right into it without any showing or teaching. Did not the advertisement say 'none but experienced hands need apply?'"

"Yes, sir," Brownie replied with a sinking heart; "but I thought it might be only a mere form; and as I am very quick to learn anything, and necessity has suddenly compelled me to labor for my living, I thought I would apply for the easiest work I could find."

"Do you think straw sewing easy work?" Mr. Coolidge asked, with a genial smile, and deeply interested in the fair stranger.

"I always thought it very pretty work, and judged it easy," she answered naively.

"Have you relatives living in New York?" Mr. Coolidge asked thoughtfully.

"I have no relatives, excepting very distant ones," and the sad tones touched him.

"Excuse me for asking the question," he added courteously, "but I feared if you remained with us the accommodations in the boarding-house might not be pleasant for you and I had hoped you had some other place in which to go."

"Thank you," Brownie answered quietly, "but if you kindly consent to my staying, the boarding-house will do as well for me as for the others whom you employ."

He opened a door opposite the one by which she had entered the office and led her into a long room where a hundred girls sat at tables, their hands flying back and forth upon the hats and bonnets as if their very existence depended upon the number of stitches which they could set in a minute; as it did, poor things!

"This is the wiring room," explained Mr. Coolidge, "and I think you could learn to do this work more easily than any other; you are not strong enough to run a machine and your fingers are too tender to finish off the tips," and he glanced at the delicate hands from which she had drawn her gloves.

"Machines! Are hats and bonnets made by machinery?" she exclaimed in surprise.

"Yes," and he smiled at her ignorance, then asked: "Do you think you would like to work here?"

"Yes," Brownie answered, "and I think I can learn very readily."

"Very well. Miss Walton, please come here a moment," Mr. Coolidge called to the overseer of the room.

She came at his bidding.

A tall, angular, sour-visaged woman, who had been in the establishment for years, and her face grew darker yet when her eyes fell upon the delicate beauty of the young girl standing by her employer's side.

She had always hated everything that was bright or beautiful, probably because it made her own deficiency in that respect so apparent.

"Miss Walton," continued Mr. Coolidge, "this is Miss Douglas, and I wish you to assign her a pleasant seat in the hall and teach her to wire hats."

"Teach her! I thought no inexperienced hands were wanted here?" exclaimed the woman, measuring the young girl with her keen eyes, and speaking in an impatient tone.

"That was what I said, Miss Walton. I desire you to teach her to wire hats. Please give her some work right away."

Mr. Coolidge spoke in a quiet, authoritative way, which there was no gainsaying, and he had specified hats, because he knew they were much easier to do than bonnets.

Without replying to him, Miss Walton told Brownie to follow her, and with a grateful smile and bow to her employer she obeyed.

She was led to a seat in a quiet corner of the hall, where Miss Walton, sitting down beside her, took up a hat and without speaking once during the operation wired it with rapid fingers, Brownie watching intently meanwhile.

"Can you do it?" she asked curtly when she had finished.

"I can try," the young girl answered with a little sigh, longing to ask a few questions yet not possessing the courage to do so of the forbidding-looking personage at her side.

And now the wearisome, lonely task of earning her own living was begun.

Her heart ached with a sense of utter desolation as she sat there, vainly trying to imitate Miss Walton's example of wiring a hat.

She felt more utterly alone among these hundred girls than she had done the night before in her quiet room at the hotel.

The wire hurt her delicate fingers, the needle, instead of going to its appointed place, often slipped and pierced their rosy tips, and the crimson drops would ooze forth, causing her to lay aside her work and wrap the wounded members in her handkerchief until they ceased to bleed, lest they should stain the hat.

One sad-looking girl on her left had, without appearing to do so, been watching her ineffectual efforts with a great deal of sympathy.

When at length, after running her needle half its length under her finger-nail, Brownie laid down her work in despair, she turned kindly toward her and said with a smile:

"The work is new to you, isn't it?"

"Yes," Brownie replied, looking up at the sweet tones, and much comforted by them; "and I am afraid I shall never learn. I am so awkward."

"Oh, yes, you will. We were all so at the beginning."

"Were you? Then I'll try again," she said, brightening instantly.

It was a real comfort to her to know that she was not quite such a goose as she had thought herself, after all.

"Perhaps if I show you how to hold the hat, and just how to set the needle, you would get on faster," said the strange girl, laying down her work and holding out her hand for Brownie's.

It was even so. She was very quick in her motions and apt to learn and after a while she found she could wire a hat in ten minutes, when at first it had taken her more than double that time.

But the confinement—the close, hot room, the noise of distant machinery and incessant chatter of the girls around her began to wear upon her.

Her head throbbed and ached, as did also her arms and back, from their unaccustomed work, and she grew so tired and nervous that it seemed to her when night came as if her brain were turned.

Wearily and sorrowfully she wended her way back to the hotel where she had stopped the night before, and threw herself upon her bed, too thoroughly worn out to even heed the demands of hunger.

But her strong spirit conquered at last and rising she bathed her face and head, rearranged her toilet, put on her hat again and went down to the office to settle her bill at the hotel.

Notwithstanding her loneliness on the night of her arrival, after the noise and din of the day, she would gladly have remained in that quiet room, but she knew her purse would not permit of it; so, after paying the clerk, she ordered a carriage and proceeded to the factory boarding-house, which was to be her home for the present.

CHAPTER VIII.

AN ADVENTURE.

The days passed slowly by, and Brownie became more and more accustomed to her work.

Before the week was out, she found, by diligent application, that she could earn seventy-five cents a day, and during the next week her earnings gradually crept up to a dollar a day.

She became quite hopeful after this, for her nature was naturally buoyant and she was not one who would not readily give up an undertaking, for the spirit of the Douglas was strong within her.

She began to feel very independent, too, and she really enjoyed the feeling that she was able to take care of herself.

To be sure, her earnings at the most were only six dollars a week. Three and a half of this were paid out for her board and lodging and the other dollar for washing, leaving her only a dollar and a half for other needs.

But she still had the two hundred dollars which she had received from Mr. Conrad, and her wardrobe was amply supplied for a year or two, so that she had no fears but that she could live, at least until some better position should be offered her. She hoped in time to find a situation as teacher.

Had it not been for that dreadful boarding-house, with its noise, its small, close rooms and its ill-cooked fare, she would have been comparatively content, for she had made the acquaintance of one or two young girls who were refined and intelligent like herself and who, too, had been suddenly reduced from affluence to poverty.

Mattie Burnham was the name of the young girl who had been so kind to Brownie on the first day of her life in the factory, and soon her gentleness and refinement, won a warm place in her heart.

Both of the young girls were extremely fond of reading.

One evening they issued forth, arm in arm, and wended their way to a public library to change their books, and to look over the new periodicals in the reading-room connected with it.

They exchanged their books, and then proceeding to the reading-room seated themselves in a cozy corner and were soon deeply interested in the various reading matter which lay scattered about upon the tables.

They read for an hour or more, then Mattie suddenly glancing up at the clock, asked:

"Meta, do you know what time it is?"

"No," absently.

"It is half-past eight."

"Is it?" and Brownie's eager eyes were not even raised from her book; she scarce heard what her friend was saying.

"What have you there that is so interesting?" demanded Mattie, after watching her in silence for a few minutes.

"It is a little French story, and so strangely interesting! Must we go home now?" and Brownie looked up wistfully at the clock.

"Yes, it is about time. We shall be locked out if we do not get in before ten, you know."

"Oh, well, there is time enough, then. I may read just a little more. I will read aloud to you, I know you will like it, the story is so beautifully told. Do you understand French?"

"No."

"Well, no matter, I will translate it as I go along;" and Brownie began and read for a few minutes as fast as her tongue could fly, but soon becoming as deeply interested as herself.

She at length stopped, with a sigh.

"Well, I suppose I must leave it; and they will not allow us to take any of these books out," she said regretfully.

"It is beautiful, Meta; but before we go you must read me a little in French. I should like to hear you."

Brownie laughed, and glad of any excuse to return to the book, began to read aloud in a spirited, piquant manner.

"Dear, dear, what a chatter! I should certainly take you to be a Frenchwoman yourself," interrupted Mattie, at length, adding: "It is half so interesting to me, though, as when you translated it."

She arose as she spoke, and Brownie, with another wistful look at the entrancing page, reluctantly laid the book down and followed her example.

They were suddenly arrested, however, by a pleasant voice saying:

"One moment, if you please, young ladies."

They stopped and looked around.

An old gentleman was sitting just a little back of where Brownie had sat, and he had been a very attentive listener while she was reading so glibly from the French romance. She had never dreamed of having another listener.

He was a venerable, genial-looking man, with flowing white hair and beard, and he wore gold bowed spectacles, through which his clear blue eyes beamed kindly upon them.

"Pardon me," he said, courteously rising and addressing Brownie, "but I wished to ask if you are a teacher of French?"

"No, sir," replied the young girl blushing as she thus became aware that he had been listening to her. "I only read for my own profit and amusement."

"Your accent is remarkably pure. Pardon me again, but where were you instructed in the language?"

"In Philadelphia, sir. I had a teacher who was a native, and who never allowed his class, after they once understood the language, to utter a word in any other tongue during the hours of recitation."

"An excellent plan, young lady. Now, if I would not tax your patience too far, will you kindly read me two or three more sentences in French from this book?"

The old gentleman took up the book she had but just laid aside and held it out to her.

Brownie bowed gracefully, wondering what the object could be in thus testing her powers, as she took the book and began reading again fluently.

"Thank you," he said after a few minutes, during which time he had been intently reading the face of the beautiful girl before him.

He then immediately asked her a question in French.

She smiled brightly, and answered it on the instant.

He asked another, and soon they were in a lively controversy, which was like Chaucer to poor Mattie, who was anxious to get home.

"Do you speak any other language? Can you speak Italian?"

"A piacere," Brownie responded in liquid tones which, being interpreted, means, at pleasure."

"And German?"

"I will not say I can speak it as fluently as the others, although I understand it, and can read at sight in the language. But its gutturals tones never had the attraction for me that the more musical languages of Italy and France have,"

"Are you musical?" demanded the old man abruptly after a few moments' thought.

"Yes, sir, I am passionately fond of music," returned Brownie, becoming somewhat embarrassed at being so closely questioned.

"I fear you think I am very presuming, my young friend," he said, noticing her confusion, "but I have a very particular reason for asking you these questions; and now, if you care to humor an old man, will you come into the music-room yonder and let me hear you play a little?"

Brownie had ached to get hold of a piano ever since leaving her dear old home, yet she shrank from displaying her accomplishments in so public a place.

Still the old gentleman was so courteous, and seemed so really interested in her, that she disliked to refuse him, and bowing assent, she beckoned to Mattie, and followed him to the music-room.

To her intense relief, she found it was empty, and sitting down at the piano she began lightly running her rosy fingers over the white keys.

The Beauty Bath

ONCE people bathed merely to be clean—and even then not so often as we who live in the age of bathtubs, hot and cold water, and other conveniences.

But while the bath for the purposes of cleanliness is, of course, a feature of every day, there is a special bath, the bath de luxe, the bath for beauty's sake, which should supplement the daily sponge or rub.

Once a week is often enough for this, though many of its features may be added to our daily bath to advantage.

Five pounds of bran should be boiled for fifteen minutes in plenty of water, then the liquid poured into the bath, and the bran itself, incased in a cheese-cloth bag and tossed into the tub. The bath water should be warm, and the body should stay immersed for ten or fifteen minutes.

After a bath of this kind, or any hot bath which has been of more than a few minutes' duration, always lie down, wrapped in a warm blanket. The pores will expel many impurities, and then the skin will gradually cool and become firm. Warm baths are weakening and so should not be taken too frequently, or remained in too long. For daily bathing a warm bath should be quickly taken, then followed by a quick cool sponge of the entire body, and friction with a bath towel.

For greater daintiness, the body should be powdered after a bath, using one of the talcum perforated cans of large size, or filling one of the fine sugar shakers with a handle which can be purchased from kitchen supply departments. In this case, one may use one's favorite flower for perfume, adding dried roses, violets or lilacs to the powder in the shaker, and letting it stand before using. Even the daily bath should be followed by a quick powdering from a shaker, and a patting of the body with a big puff of cotton to remove the surplus and equalize the distribution of the powder.

A spray can be used to advantage to stimulate the skin with one's favorite toilet water. This is a good thing to do after a tiring day. It rests and refreshes, and is one of the quickest ways to spur one's self up to normal if one is going out in the evening, yet feels weary after the day's tasks.

A sponge is an excellent adjunct to the toilet, not for the purposes of cleansing but for the cold sub or douche which should follow the day's bath. A small wooden bowl filled with melted soap and dropped into the tub is convenient in bathing, the cloth or brush being rubbed across its surface for the necessary soapy material. The bowl goes bobbing around, filled with one's favorite bath soap, which has been melted in hot water over the stove and through pouring into the bowl while liquid has formed a hard cake the shape of the bowl itself—and is always easy of reach. It may be perfumed to suit one's taste. Oil of geranium is a singularly clean smell and most attractive. Only two or three drops are necessary.

For a perfumed bath, not for cleanliness but for luxury, put in warm water eight ounces each of lavender, thyme and rosemary, and a half-ounce each of ground cloves, cinnamon and peppermint. Let stand for two hours, then add to your bath water. This has an antiseptic quality not to be despised.

Answers to Questions

BLUE-EYED MARGARET.—I am very glad you get pleasure and help from our Pretty Girls' Corner. That is what it is for, my dear, so come to me at any time with questions that need answering. Spots on the nails come, usually from hitting or scraping the nails. Any strong pressure is apt to produce them, so treat the nails gently. They cannot be disposed of, once they appear; we have to wait until the nail grows long enough so that they are at the tip and can be pared off. Scrub the nails daily with a good nail brush, soften the skin by soaking the hand in soapy water, then cleanse with orange-wood stick, gently pushing down the skin at the base of the nail but being very careful not to press on the nail itself. The nails are brittle because the system lacks some of the elements it needs. Rub vaseline on the nails at night to soften them. Or occasionally soak the hands in olive oil. In the meantime, see that you eat sensibly, plenty of fruit and vegetables, and drink eight to ten glasses of water daily but not at your meals. Use a hand lotion on your hands after washing them, so that the soapy water will not entirely rob your skin of its natural oil. Indeed, bran water is good to wash in, or the addition of a few drops of tincture of benzoin to a bowl of water will aid in cleansing without so much soap.

TROUBLED B., N. C.—I don't quite understand your difficulty. Have you ever had chickenpox or smallpox which might leave a pit such as you describe? Your description of its depth would seem to indicate that it is something much more than an enlarged pore. I should dislike to advise you to "fill it up" for this might cause some sort of a sore on your cheek. What does your doctor say about it? For scars one can sometimes apply a little collodion which hardens at once into a thin coating, and over this one can powder, but I doubt the advisability of doing anything like this with your cheek. If you have somewhat exaggerated its size, then perhaps it might be nothing more than an enlarged pore and the treatment would be to keep it clean, and after cleansing, touch it with peroxide or camphor. To cleanse it, use hot water, then rinse with warm water, and finally use cold water over it on a cloth. After this, apply the peroxide, camphor or a bit of alcohol. Don't pick it.

CAMBRIDGE.—Your red nose comes from your poor circulation. You need to exercise daily, for fifteen minutes in the morning and fifteen minutes at night before going to bed. Then you must get rid of that constipation. Exercise, of course, will help about that, but you also need to be careful about your food. The milk diet is a good idea and I will give you directions, but first let me tell you what to do when not on the milk diet. Drink water, first of all; your body needs a great deal of liquid. Cut out constipating foods, such as potatoes, white bread, cakes, pies, griddlecakes, hot breads, etc. Eat easily digested foods and those which are not what we call starchy. You can take soup with your meal, beets, string beans, asparagus, tomatoes, canned corn, baked squash, etc. Chew each mouthful until it is liquid before swallowing, and thus the work of digestion will be made easy. In the morning eat for breakfast, a large dish of prunes that have been soaked all night, in a great deal of water, then stewed gently for an hour or more until perfectly soft. Do this every morning. You can eat in addition two soft-boiled or poached eggs, but they must not be cooked over four minutes if boiled, and three-and-a-half minutes is better; while for poached eggs they must be broken into water that has been boiling but which you have set back on the stove where it will not boil after the eggs are in it. Cook the eggs only until the white is well formed. With two eggs, and your prunes, and a slice of toasted whole wheat bread well chewed, you will have a perfectly good breakfast. Lettuce salad is a good thing for you to eat with any meal, and good hot soup, not greasy, is excellent. Do not eat pork or veal, which are hard to digest and would probably constipate you, and do not eat fried meat of any kind or indeed any fried food. Let your meats be roasted or broiled, and rather rare. These foods I am recommending are all easy of digestion, and that is what you need. For fruits, grapefruit, pineapple, baked apple, stewed prunes, canned peaches, if not too rich, sliced oranges, raw apples, all are good. Do not eat bananas. Only simple desserts are permissible, such as icecream, baked custard, prune souffle, etc. Cut out candy, cake, pie. Now as to exercise: Every morning before rising, practice the following exercise for five or ten minutes, and do the same thing at night when you are undressed and there are no bands or belts to bind you. Then after rising, practice the second exercise I give below, and do this also at night.

Exercise for Constipation

Lying on your back on the bed, arms at sides, raise the right leg until it is at right angles with the body, without bending the knee. Do this slowly. Now let the right leg down, just as slowly as you possibly can, and exactly as if some pulley were holding it up. You will feel a pull on the abdominal muscles in doing this exercise, and that is what I prescribe for it, for it is your abdominal muscles which need to be exercised to the point of fatigue. After practicing this eight or ten times with the right leg, repeat with the left, and then after a moment's rest practice with both.

Exercise No. Two

Standing erect, chest up, shoulders dropped, hands on the hips with fingers forward, bend the right knee until it touches the chest, without bending the back at all. You may not be able to do this at first, but practice it over and over again. Repeat with left knee, then spreading the legs apart about eighteen inches, raise the arms above the head, palms together, elbows straight and throw them out and down with force, and back between the legs as far as they will go. Keep the knees stiff, as well as the elbows. Bend only at the waist.

I suggest that you practice these two exercises daily for a month and correct your diet as I have recommended before you begin on the milk diet.

DARDANELLA.—There is no medicine which will cure stammering. It is a matter of training, and you can do a great deal for yourself. Your parents should not scold you, because that actually does make the stammering worse as all specialists in curing stammering could tell you. Show them this answer to you and tell them that I know how they feel about it, but that scientific men and physicians now say that scolding makes the matter worse. The thing for you to do is never try to answer quickly or to speak in a hurry. Be very deliberate. Do not be afraid you are going to stammer. Make your mind feel that you are going to speak with perfect clearness; then very slowly form the word. You must practice speaking much, much slower than anybody else, and never attempting to speak the moment you are spoken to. Instead take time to make an effort and carefully form the sounds you wish to make. Will you try? Your parents will help, I am sure, by not speaking to you quickly, but not talking about your stammering, and by not noticing you when you are trying slowly to form the words you need. With their cooperation and your own earnest efforts I think you will be able to control this.

A good exercise for legs is to stand with chest out, chin up, hands on hips, then rise slowly to the very tips of the toes without bending the body or the knees. Just as slowly you should let the heels sink to the floor. The value of this exercise lies in doing it slowly and rising to the very tips of the toes. This exercises the calves of the legs. As to making hair curly, that can't be done, my dear, I'm sorry to say!

AUBURN.—See directions given "Cambridge." Give up your cathartics and begin to use water, fruits, exercise. Be particular about the prunes that are prescribed, and always eat an apple or an orange before going to bed, chewing it thoroughly if it is an apple, but not swallowing the pulp of the orange. You probably eat hot breads, and fried foods, and possibly a good deal of salt pork or pork in other forms. Cut these out, you do not need them and they are giving you no nourishment because you are not digesting them properly. So stick to the simple foods I have recommended.

BLUE EYES FROM NEW JERSEY.—Do you take a daily body bath, scrubbing every part of the body thoroughly? That will do away with one trouble of which you complain. The pimples may come from constipation, or they may be due to your age, as you say. Your bowels should move freely at least once a day, and it is better if they move twice, and you should not need to use cathartics. Drink quantities of water. See my answer to "Cambridge" and you will find some good advice there about foods and exercise, both of which you should watch carefully. Cold cream is a good base for powder, for the latter alone is drying to the skin. I always recommend rubbing in a little cold cream to the skin, massaging until it is all absorbed; then wiping the face with a pad of cotton, and then applying powder. I think you will find this better for your skin than powder without cold cream. The vaseline will make your brows soft but not cause them to grow. Brush the eyebrows with a tiny eyebrow brush, like a baby's toothbrush; let the eyelashes alone. Rubbing the eyes breaks the lashes off, so be careful about that. Vaseline applied at night helps to keep the edges of the lids soft but will not grow hair. Either color of vaseline will do.

PATIENT WAITER.—I am only supposed to give advice about beauty, my dear, but since you ask me about that fifteen-year-old boy friend, let me say that I should not under any circumstances let him kiss me or put his arms about me. You are both too young to talk about love, though it is perfectly natural that you should like each other, and I am glad you do, if he is a nice boy, as I am sure he must be or you would not be friends with him. Let me tell you something about boys, though, my dear. They naturally like to kiss pretty girls whom they like, but they don't like to think that a girl is willing to be kissed; so though they ask and ask and ask, the moment she lets them kiss her they do not have so good an opinion of her and before very long are sure to turn to some other girl. Not quite fair, is it? But it always works out that way. And the man who wants to prove his love, doesn't ask a girl to kiss him or permit any familiarity until he has asked her to marry him. And fifteen, my dear, is far too young to be married or to think of being married. Be satisfied to have a good time at parties and sleighrides and picnics for several years to come, and say to every boy: "I don't permit kisses or any familiarity. I want to be good friends, and I like you, and I want you to like me well enough to respect me, and kissing isn't any proof."

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half a pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. It will gradually darken streaked, faded or gray hair and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.—Advt.

Free Trial Bottle

Restore your Gray Hair to natural color and keep young

I ask every gray haired person to accept my free trial offer and learn how to bring back easily and safely the original color. I want them to learn without expense how a clear, colorless liquid, clean as water, restores the beauty of youth.

I perfected this Restorer for my own use—to restore the color to my own hair, which was prematurely gray. And though I am no longer young my abundant hair is still admired. So I know from experience that it is folly for any young person to let gray hair brand them as "getting old." It is equally unnecessary for those who are older to let gray streaks and silver threads increase the look of age.

No—restore your gray hair this safe, simple, scientific way which millions have found satisfactory. For my Restorer is the biggest seller and most popular preparation of its kind in the world.

Mail the coupon today for free trial bottle and make my famous convincing "single lock test." Note how easily it is applied, how dainty it is and how nice it leaves the hair. No greasy sediment, nothing to wash or rub off, nothing to make your hair sticky. Shampoo as usual—the restored color is permanent. Just forget you ever had gray hair. Hair discolored by bleaching or poor dyes can be restored just as surely and safely as hair that is naturally gray. This restoration is done by yourself, in private. No one need know your secret.

Fill out coupon carefully. Use X to tell color of hair. If possible enclose a lock of hair in your letter. Then when you know that your gray hair can be restored safely, easily and surely, get a full sized bottle from your druggist or order direct from us.

Alkali in Shampoos Bad For Washing Hair

Use plenty of lather. Rub it in thoroughly and briskly with the finger-tips.

Many soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much free alkali which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It is very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces. You can get Mulsified at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water is all that is required. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub the Mulsified in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy and easy to manage. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff. Be sure your druggist gives you Mulsified.

What's Your Social Value?

By Andre Dupont

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ARE all your friends glad to see you come in at the door? Do they look up with pleasure and say, "Oh, there's Mr. Smith (or maybe it's Mrs. or Miss Smith)—I was afraid he wasn't coming," and do they look as if they really meant it?

You haven't seen anybody do this lately, not so you could notice it anyway. You haven't even intercepted a glance in your direction that conveyed this pleasant information without the necessity of saying anything at all? Well, it must be because you are not socially valuable.

What is being socially valuable, you ask? For perhaps the expression is a new one to you and also the idea which it conveys.

Social value is of course nothing more than your value to society. Do you give something for what you get? Do you always try to be as agreeable as you can, or do you indulge in moods or even grouches or sit back lazily and let other people entertain you? Social value is the art of bringing something beside your mere presence whenever you go to call on your friends or attend any entertainment or are invited out to dinner or supper or anything else. It is the habit of bringing with you something interesting to talk about or something that will make your friends laugh, or will touch their sympathies or help or even uplift them. A person can be socially valuable in so many ways that it would take a book to tell them all.

One of the secrets of social success is to make the most of every little gift that you happen to possess. Take for instance the commonest of all gifts, conversation. You realize, maybe, that you are not a very interesting talker, and you envy some friend more gifted when you see people literally "hang on his words." But the knack of pleasant conversation can be cultivated if one lacks it. First take a keen interest in what is going on in the world, stop thinking about yourself, and you will soon find yourself speaking the word in season and surprising yourself as well as others by the quickness with which your thoughts are expressed.

If you are invited to a dinner, or a dance or to any place where you wish to make an especially good impression and you find it hard to talk interestingly to entire strangers, there is not the least harm in cramming a little just beforehand. By "cramming" I mean thinking over before you go a few things you might say if you get the chance. Perhaps refreshing your memory by reading over again some funny anecdote that struck your fancy when you took up a paper or magazine the other day, but try to have it short and snappy and impress the point in your mind even if you forget the other details. It is not a bad plan also to think over whatever you know that will interest a stranger. Perhaps a little about a new book you have read, a thrilling or educational "movie" you have lately seen or even some good play; or exceptional music or anything like that. After a while when you become used to talking generalities interestingly this preliminary studying over what you shall say will, of course, not be necessary. But for the person who has not been gifted by nature with a glib tongue it will be found invaluable practice for a while.

It is not necessary to be gifted in any way to have accomplishments that are valuable socially. One of the chief ingredients of social popularity is to make the most of your talents. Even an indifferent voice can give real pleasure with a small repertoire of songs, sung sympathetically and in tune. It requires but little musical ability to be able to play an accompaniment on the guitar or banjo.

People sometimes say that they detest games as if inability to enjoy an indoor game was a mark of superiority. Now games are certainly not exhilerating as a steady diet, but everybody cannot dance, and there are certain social occasions when conversation lags so they provide an amusement greatly enjoyed by many people. Everybody likes the man or woman who takes a hand at cards or an active part in guessing games or contests or in whatever way his assistance is needed and people like him none the less even if he is not a very good player. The important point is his interest and cheerful willingness to do anything that will help entertain the company, and this is another way to be "socially valuable."

demure little towheads and brunettes. Also some want their shoes and socks painted on while others prefer the pull-off ones. When finished my dollies immediately set up a howl for the fig leaves to be passed and these I supply by making dainty undies and pretty plain little aprons such as their mothers wear. One would never guess how expensive they look and how inexpensive they really are, by reading my poor attempt at writing of them.

I like to make pretty underclothes for grownups too and it is surprising what pleasing combinations can be made of a bit of lace or tatting and a yard or two of cheap material and a touch of hand embroidery. Of course I prefer nice material, but the legacy I inherited did not include money so I must be content with things suitable for a country school ma'am. Money is such a small part of the "valuables" of life anyway. Good health, a sunny disposition and a pure heart will outweigh all the gold in the world if weighed on the scales of happiness. I have been sick a great deal in the past, enough to make me realize the true worth of a sound body and also that an ambition for things of the world only seldom brings success. I'm now trying my best to forget the past by living only in the present and looking forward to a happy future. I find that the more I ponder over and talk about my illness, aches and pains, the more they thrive and grow. It took me a long time to learn this, for I loved sympathy and was foolish enough to believe that the sympathy of my friends helped me, while now I know it only harmed me. Hard hearted, did you say? Not a bit of it. While I feel sometimes that I'm the exact opposite of the word "perfection" I earnestly believe in the divine love of Jesus for both saints and sinners, and feel that when things "go wrong" it is our fault instead of the "Special Providence" so often alluded to.

I know my letter is growing like a school boy, but I simply cannot help saying a word about flowers. I love them dearly enough though you'd hardly believe it if you could see ours. All dried up with the sun. That is, most of them are. We have cinnamon and maderia vines on the front of the porch. I don't think there is anything in the world prettier, cooler or more delicate than the cinnamon vine, and so easy to grow. It is never bothered by any disease or insect and is pretty several weeks after frost. Too, our petunias, zinnias, cannas, elephant ears and sweet peas have withstood the dry weather wonderfully and our potted plants are not hurt. Two of our prettiest ferns are the common wild ones which grow abundantly here. One is like the Boston only more hardy. The other has broad, feathery fronds, sometimes growing four and five feet long, near the creek banks. It is not as hardy as the other though. Our woods are a solid mass of color from early spring until late autumn. Honeysuckle, woodbine, golden jasmine, wild asters, daisies, violets and others too numerous to mention. Just wish every one of you with your babies, puppy dogs and kitty cats could take a day off and ramble over these Alabama hills and rocks with me. We'd go to the "Ball Rock," the old water mill and back by way of the Natural Rock Bridge, from which our little village received its name.

I believe it is customary to send a description of one's self, but I won't. I'll just confess that my besetting sin is my longing for the unattainable. By that, I mean beauty.

I shall be pleased to hear from those teaching, or having taught, the primary grades. Also to exchange flowers or anything I might have for something that would help me in teaching the little ones intrusted to me.

With sincere good wishes for the happiness of each COMFORT reader and the COMFORT staff, I am,
Your friend, EMMA L. SHONK.

EUREKA SPRINGS, R. R. 1, ARK.

HELLO EVERYBODY:

No, this is not my first attempt but Mrs. Wilkinson found better letters for the space mine would have occupied. I'm not the least bit out of humor but think I will write once a month until I am admitted.

I am a young woman of twenty-one years. Have been married two and one-half years to one of the best of men. We have a dear little girl twenty months old. She has been walking and talking for a long time. I like to see the baby pictures in COMFORT. Will send my girl's picture some time.

I make nightgown cases for Christmas presents. To make, take a piece of sateen 32 inches long and 12 or 15 inches wide, line up and turn up about twelve inches to form pocket, turn the other end down and round off for a flap, bind edges with ribbon or cretonne.

Let me say to Undecided Mother that I would not give my little girl dancing lessons under any circumstances.

I will be glad to hear from any who care to write.
MRS. M. A. MEEKS.

GLENDALE, BOX 762, ARIZONA.

FRIENDS OF MINE:

What have you to be thankful for? I have many things too numerous to mention, even though I sit here and watch people go by in automobiles, to the mountains for a picnic. I have to remain at home for I have a sick baby, but nevertheless I am thankful for many, many things.

I am enclosing a picture of my three-year-old girl who won the prize at a baby show held here. There were seventy babies in it. She is posed as Kewpie.

I live in the heart of the great Salt River Valley, a beautiful country. If any of the sisters would like to know more about this country and will write me, enclosing stamp, I will be glad to tell them about it as I see it.

I receive much help from COMFORT, more than from any other magazine I take, and it is the only one I have ever worked for.

POSED AS KEWPIE.

This is how I make fruit rolls for the children: Chop one cup of raisins, one cup of walnuts and one-quarter cup crystallized ginger, knead together on a board dredged with powdered sugar and form into long, thin rolls. Coat with cocoanut and set in a cool place until firm. Time in combining, about twenty-five minutes. This recipe makes twenty-four pieces. I find this easy to prepare and is more healthful than ordinary candy for children.

I am going to ask a small favor. Will those who care to, send me a scrap of cloth large enough for a quilt block. I wish to make a COMFORT quilt.

Now for what I look like: I am a young mother of three children, have chestnut brown hair, grey eyes, weigh 120 pounds and am five feet, three inches tall.

Good wishes to you. MRS. D. O. EDWARDS.

Mrs. Edwards.—Your daughter (you didn't tell us her name) resembles a mischievous little fairy more than she does a Kewpie.—Ed.

MY COMFORTERS:

I don't know which was the most exciting, being nearly scared to death when a storm took the roof off our house and I ran into the chimney, or about my second trip in a Ford and Daddy running into a street car and from that into a big car, but things could have been worse. I don't remember how, but I, with a two weeks old baby got out of that Ford safe and sound. I have three babies, Vivian, four, Olivia, three and my baby boy J. O. Jr. is ten months old. My first baby is in Heaven. We've been married seven happy years and are not blessed with much of this world's goods except a good Ford and a U. S. Mail Route.

The sisters tell how they make their homes attractive. I wish someone who lives in a rented house, with rough floors and deep cracks for dust and dirt to collect, would tell what they did to make it look fit. I live in such a house. My kitchen shelves are covered with white paper and behind the stove, where I hang my cooking dishes, is a large piece of reddish brown paper that shows off my aluminum ware, and on my kitchen table is white oil cloth. My one window has sugar sack curtains with flowers appliqued on them. My dining-room has one window and a kind of built-in cupboard that has no doors. I made long curtains from unbleached muslin, with fruit and flowers at the bottom, and put it on a roller and it serves the purpose. My window has a sash curtain trimmed with blue gingham, with tiny flowers in the corners.

Now to Christmas presents. I give very few and receive even less. My mother's present was cup towels made of flour sacks; one sister's was a dust cap made from scraps of organdie, lace and ribbon, the other a crocheted yoke for nightgown. For baby, two years old, I made a table cover, bib and napkin of Indian head, with colored stitches around edges. Sister said the baby couldn't possibly eat without it. For my baby I made a little chair from a drygoods box and covered it with cretonne. I made a baby table, bed and cupboard for my little girls' dolls. The little things are not painted for I couldn't afford it.

COMFORT is a grand paper and I love everything in it. Can anyone tell me where Pearl Vesey has gone? She was a dear pen friend of mine.

Nelle, you're a wonder, so is Mrs. Marsh. I like your letters.

Would you like to know what the Texas sister looks like who sent Pearl V. the okra seeds? She is five feet, three inches tall, weighs 240 pounds, has red hair, a freckled face and a heart that is kind. Pen letters.

Love to all, your big sister,
MRS. PEARL MCWHIRT.

ROSEVILLE, [illegible]

DEAR SISTERS:

I haven't taken COMFORT very long but my mother has for years.

I will give you my idea about buying Christmas presents for father and mother. Many of us buy something for them that the whole family can use, or not buy a present for their own personal use, for instance, a pair of house slippers or combs or something they and no one else will use. Get them something they have always wanted and never had. One Christmas I got Mamma a ring, she hadn't had one since she was a small girl, and she was so pleased and proud with it.

I've noticed in all the letters that none give father any praise. Of course mother can never get all she deserves but I think we should praise father, too. Who is he the one who paid the bills and tried in every way to give us the best of everything? My father is a dear and mother is my chum, big sister and mother little one. I have one brother and two sisters at home younger than I am. I suppose you are wondering what I look like. I have light brown hair, gray eyes and rather light complexion. Am five feet, two inches and weigh 107 pounds. I have been married for one year to the best man living but that's what you all say, isn't it?

I hope to hear from some of the sisters and will answer all who send stamps.

MRS. CLARE D. HIPPLE

ARMANDVILLE, IA.

MY DEAR FRIENDS:

Isn't it strange how you are inspired to write a letter every time you get COMFORT and read the wonderful letters published in the Sisters' Corner? I seldom see a letter from the Sunny South and I know that when I am writing this letter with a summer dress on and all the windows open, you northern sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson are trying to get closer to the fire. Want to trade places with me?

Molly-Joe must be a dear girl.

I can't write much about housekeeping because I've only helped Mamma but I can say a little about children because I teach sixty of them. I am in a rural school and have grades one to five. I find my work very interesting and I think every girl should teach school a while. It helps one to understand and love children better. At least, that's my own experience. Teachers, visit the children's homes. You learn to know the child better and it gives you a chance to know the parents. It pays to be friendly with everybody and especially in a rural community where "the teacher" is a person of importance. Be careful how you dress and act because the children are going to imitate you. Also do all you can to let the children enjoy their school days. There is a time for work but let the play time be happy. Would you like to hear about the Christmas entertainment I had? It's too late for this year but remember it for next. I began planning and practicing about two months before Christmas so I was not rushed. Every child had a part. I had a great many recitations, some dialogues and Christmas songs. Of course we had a tree and I let the children make most of the decorations. Everybody here raises sugar cane, pop-corn, peanuts and pecans so I suggested that each child bring syrup, sugar, pop-corn or whatever they had. In that way they all brought the articles they could spare and I made candy and pop-corn balls to be given away at the Christmas tree. Each child drew names and bought a present for someone else I gave each of them an inexpensive present. I invited the community and had a kind of reception. Everything was free and everyone had more than they could eat so you may be sure I had to make plenty of candy and pop-corn balls. Many of the children had never seen a Christmas tree.

You can have a reception for the closing of school. I have little costume songs and dances. Most of the costumes can be made of crepe paper and are very attractive.

How many sisters know what a wonderful state Louisiana is? Do you know that it leads the world in the production of sulphur? We also have several large bleeding surface, with the mold off the walls ground into it. "But we can never get them," with a shudder. She seemed to hear once more that black, sullen stream in her ears. "Unless we go the other way!" But even in her own ears the words sounded a mockery. If Lesard, whose every muscle was trained to obey him, could not get in the "other way," how could she? And yet there was a queer determination in her voice as she answered Gillian's quick question:

"What do you mean—what did Marchmont mean by the other way?"

"Sit down and I'll tell you." Regardless of her aching hand, she leaned forward and spoke in Gill's very ear, lest the walls might hear her.

"And he's down there, in this very house."

Gillian started up in white terror. "He may come up."

"He can't. They locked the door. The stone is too heavy to move, and the wine-bin——"

Gillian, who had been Lesard's wife, interrupted her.

"Suppose he drowns—down there in the dark!" she said; and the tone of her voice was not good.

"Hush!" said Jacky angrily. "He swims like a fish." She hated him, but she had seen the place, and Gillian had not. It sickened her to think of even a rat struggling in that dreadful water, and Lesard was all strength, living steel. She turned from the ghastly vision, appalled by the hatred that was greater than her own.

"Don't speak like that," she cried. "He's gone, by now, ever so far. Tomorrow we must find the way he went out. We'll beat him yet."

"Not while he's alive," abruptly. "If you knew him better you'd know that!"

Jacky set her teeth.

What made her remember that day when against all her will the Lesard she loved had made her come to him; cross the room to him—at the word of her master? Blind with tears she turned away, lest she, too, might pray that that Lesard was dead.

CHAPTER XII.

"THE OTHER WAY.

"We will go and look for that stream the first thing after breakfast," Gillian had said the night before. But she counted without the weather and Mr. Marchmont. It still rained in pitiless torrents, lashing blindly against the windows; and her guardian was in one of his most urbane and dangerous moods.

He took the reluctant Gillian to the billiard-room and amused himself with her hopeless efforts to make even one fair stroke. If he had known why her hand shook and her mouth was tense with nervousness he might not have thought her cowed demeanor so amusing. But he put it down to her usual discomfort in his society.

"Try once more, and pray stand less as if you were waiting to be hanged!" he remarked, as she just escaped cutting the cloth.

Gillian put down her cue.

"I can't, I'm too stupid," she said wearily. "It can give you no pleasure to play with me."

She glanced at the clock as she spoke. It was nearly lunch-time, and the precious minutes were flying by, each one priceless. She had the same distrust as Brookes had of the man left behind in the cave by the water. If she and Jacky could not find the outlet of that queer, hidden passage that very day, something told her it would be too late to save the jewels. Little Mrs. Fareham would be up in court for the loss of hers, with an ugly stain on her name that it had been in Gillian's power to prevent.

But the Gillian who had stood silent that night, and kept Jacky silent, for love of Lesard, would be a spectator no longer. She was ready and aching to begin her part in the play—to fight evil with good. And it almost seemed as if Marchmont had a purpose in keeping her under his eyes. She dared not show the faintest impatience; the least wish to be gone.

Her nerves all on edge, she wondered if, after all, they were not too late; if Lesard had not been beforehand with her and Jacky and taken the things in the night. She looked at the pelting rain and knew that she dared make no excuse to go for a walk in such weather. To hide her despairing face she walked to the window and stared out. More than ever she felt she was a slave in this house. Any other girl would have gone out boldly directly after breakfast. Gillian had not dared.

Something in her attitude caught Marchmont's eye.

She looked languid, yet nervous; she was paler, too, and thinner than she had been. If she were not careful she would lose her looks; people would think he ill-treated her.

"You don't go out enough," he said. "You are losing your color."

"It doesn't matter." Suddenly she felt that at all hazards she must get away from him. She could not trust herself.

"You want excitement," he said musingly. Perhaps, after all, it would have been safer to have encouraged the budding admiration he had seen in Sir Charles Vivian.

A young man, in Mr. Marchmont's mind, was the best of all tonics for a woman; someone to dress for, to plan to meet. Yet something had bidden him beware of Charles Vivian. He dismissed the subject with a well-bred gesture of distaste.

"I have a surprise for you, by the way," he observed, drawing a leather case from his pocket. "I have replaced your pearls, since there is no sign of them being found. Here is a new collar. It came this morning from London."

Gillian turned from the window.

"New pearls—from London," she stammered. Then she controlled herself sharply, knowing it was a lie, as she took the jeweler's box from his hand.

It was new, certainly, whether it had come this morning or not. But the pearl collar, on its blue velvet bed, was the old one. She saw the tiny nick she had made one night with her silver nail-file, when it had obstinately refused to be unclasped.

So this was what Jacky had seen Marchmont take from the canvas belt last night! And he dared come to her with an open lie, and she must pretend to believe it.

She stood gazing at the collar, conscious of his eyes on her face, frightened more terribly each instant lest he might read the knowledge that was written there. Oh, for someone, anyone, to interrupt them! Marchmont was no fool. He would find out, unless someone came to save her, that she knew the collar—knew where it had been.

"I—I," she was stuttering in her fear.

"You what?" said Marchmont slowly, evilly.

"I never saw them before," she answered feebly.

"How could you? My dear Gillian, you are talking nonsense," but there was suspicion in his face, and she saw it.

Utterly at loss, she stood waiting for she knew not what, but before she could speak an interruption came from Heaven. Brookes threw open the door.

"Sir Charles Vivian!" he announced, in his level, servant's voice, and Gillian wondered if she had dreamed that only a few hours before she had heard him speaking to Marchmont with angry equality.

Marchmont's dull suspicion died on the instant. The girl must have expected Vivian, that was what had made her so absent, so queer!

He turned to the visitor, urbane, courtly, delighted to see him on such an inclement day. Inwardly he reflected that if Gillian were in love with the man it would be damnably inconvenient. Sir Charles in and out of the house all day long would be—bah! it was not to be thought of. But he would deal with that by and by. Today he would be civility itself.

Sir Charles at the moment stood looking at Gillian with dismay in his handsome face.

She looked pale, strained, frightened. Just as she had looked that night at Wellford House. It was odd, for she was surrounded with luxury, but very surely there was something wrong somewhere. His glance fell on the open case in her hand, where the pearls shone softly.

"What!" he cried involuntarily, "have you got back your pearls?"

"Unfortunately, no!" Marchmont answered for her. "They are a new set. I ordered them for a surprise. I knew Gillian was fretting about the others."

"I shall not fret any longer." Gillian, smiling politely, shut the case with a snap. "Thank you Mr. Marchmont! I shall take better care of these."

Marchmont was furious that Sir Charles should have seen the necklet, though it was absurd to suppose that any one could know it was not fresh from the shop.

"You will lunch with us after your long ride?" he said quickly. "Oh, yes! I assure you we insist on it."

"I came on business, really," Vivian returned, rather shyly. "One of your tenants has been stopping people from using the short cut over the Long Meadow, and I have had a hundred complaints from my laborers. It saves them a round of five miles, you know."

"The Long Meadow?"

"By that outlying farmhouse of yours, that has recently been let. Ashcroft, I think it's called."

Marchmont nodded, with sudden recollection.

"Of course, of course! I'll tell the man at once," he returned fussily. "But you must not blame me. I knew nothing of a right of way there. I did not warn him."

A right of way through Ashcroft! No wonder Billy had been turning people back. What a fool he had been ever to let him go there—and Lesard, too.

"My dear Sir Charles, you must let me apologize," he said unctuously. "A poor wanderer like me finds many things forgotten when he settles down to his old country life. Yet I can't altogether regret my oversight, since it has brought you to enliven our quiet luncheon."

"I'm hardly fit," Vivian began, looking down at his splashed boots, his damp clothes. But Gillian's voice, clear, appealing, cut him short.

"Please stay. We shall be delighted," was all she said, but Vivian, glancing at her, saw her eyes full of an earnestness he could not understand—unless she really was glad to see him!

He smiled with surprised pleasure.

"I shall be very glad," he said cheerfully, little knowing how near the girl had been to detection when his lucky advent turned the current of her guardian's thoughts.

Luncheon was announced almost immediately, and Vivian, through that excellent meal, had a growing sense that all was not right with his hostess. She laughed and talked certainly, but her lovely dark eyebrows were contracted, and she looked as a prisoner might who has planned to escape and sees the chance slipping by. He felt certain Marchmont had been scolding her about the old pearls even while he gave her the new ones. There had been something perilously like a scene in that dialogue he had interrupted. A long bar of sunshine shot across the table as he thought.

"We're going to have a fine afternoon!" he cried, pointing to the sudden break in the lowering sky. "Miss Hamilton, you ought to go out."

A sudden boldness, an inspiration, came over her.

"I will take you for a walk before you go," she said quietly, "that is," turning to Marchmont, "if you don't want me."

That gentleman for once was taken aback. Yet he certainly did not want her. It would fall in with his plans well enough. He meant to drive over to Sir Simon Wellford's and find out just what the London detective was doing. And Gillian, for some unknown reason, had been barely civil to the man the night before.

He did not want her to meet him again and repeat that piece of bad policy.

"No, I don't want you, my dear girl," he said perfunctorily. "I have business this afternoon, now that it is fine. I rely on Sir Charles not to let you get wet," with the smile the other man instinctively disliked.

Gillian, afraid to trust in her own good luck, rose from the table.

"I'll get my things on," she said hastily, "I will be ready by the time you have had a cigarette."

But she was longer than she had intended.

As she came down-stairs in her tight-fitting gray cloth, a smart gray toque on her chestnut hair, Vivian stood waiting for her in the hall.

"I've kept you waiting. I couldn't find my maid. I don't understand it," she said, as she reached him.

"You seem to have done very well without her." He wondered if any other girl in the world were quite so lovely, or wore her gowns with such a grace. All at once he saw there was fresh trouble in her eyes.

"Would you rather not go out?" he asked. "Is there anything wrong?"

She shook her head, mindful of Brookes, who was opening the door for them to go out into the spring sunshine, and she led the way.

Jacky, she had been told by the housemaid who answered her bell, was with Mr. Marchmont. What could it mean? Did he suspect anything? She dared not wait to find out, but her step was very slow and dragging as she walked down the drive.

"Did Mr. Marchmont leave you when I did?" she asked her wondering companion.

He nodded.

"Said he must write a letter. Why? Did you want him?

"No!" hastily, "but he sent for my maid. I can't think why. Sir Charles," she turned to him in reckless appeal, "do you mind coming into the garden and waiting till he drives off? The carriage is just coming round. I can't go far till I know what he wanted of Ja—james!" stumbling over the name.

"Whatever you like," lightly, but inwardly marveling.

What sort of man could her guardian be that she trembled at his sending for her maid? He saw plainly that she could scarcely speak for anxiety.

Jacky had changed color under her face bleach when the quick summons from Marchmont had sent her flying down the back stairs to his sanctum. He had never apparently known that she was in the house till now. But her nerve was better than Gillian's. She stood before the master of the house as calmly as though he had been in the habit of sending for her.

Marchmont, glancing at her, saw an odd-looking girl, very pale, with smooth red hair, particularly neat in her black satin gown. He had a horror of red hair, as some men have of cats, and his eyes turned from her distastefully.

"Your mistress has gone out," he said smoothly, "for a walk with Sir Charles Vivian. Take her waterproof and go after her. I do not trust the weather. And see that you keep her in sight throughout the afternoon. You understand me!" sharply.

"Yes, sir." Jacky knew better than to be surprised.

Marchmont little thought she dared not look at him for fear he should notice the dark, sapphire eyes that were so extraordinary for a red-haired girl, and too brave and beautiful for her well-drilled face.

"And keep within hearing, too," he added dryly. "That is all. You can go!"

She was a queer-looking girl for Billy to have sent. She must be clever for all her downcast demureness. He little knew that she was overjoyed as she ran to do his bidding. He had played into her hand; had given her and Gillian the chance they had despaired of. As for Sir Charles, he was in the way, but it could not be helped, and Gillian must look after him.

As Marchmont drove off in the victoria he saw the red-haired maid fastidiously picking her way over the wet gravel, in the wake of her mistress' footsteps. What he did not see was the sudden start Gillian gave when Jacky came round some shrubs, the haste with which she ran to her.

"Oh, Jacky! What was it?" She was quite regardless of Sir Charles, but not so Jacky.

"Nothing, Miss Gillian," she frowned at her to be careful. "I was to bring your waterproof and ask if you had any orders." Then, under her breath, her back to Vivian, "I'm to keep you in sight. But go down to the beechwood by the old wall!"

Sir Charles, who had fair wits of his own, saw the quick, cautioning frown on the maid's face that went so oddly with her smooth words. And her voice, too, seemed to strike a chord in his memory. Where had he heard it before? Yet he knew the thought was absurd, if anything could be absurd in a house where the maid frowned authoritatively at the mistress. Could Marchmont allow Gillian to be bullied by her own servant?

But as Gillian turned to him after a quick, inaudible word to the girl, he knew that, wherever the trouble was, it was not between mistress and maid. Every trace of wretchedness was gone from her face. Instead it was bright, excited.

"Did you know you were a wicked wolf!" she cried, smiling up at him. "That is my sheep-dog, who is sent to protect me."

"You don't seem to mind!" rather piqued.

Gillian laughed. The sun on her lovely, parted lips, her pearl-white teeth.

"Mind Jacky? James, I mean—no!"

"Why do you call her Jacky?"

"Oh, James means Jacques. Jacky is for short!" overriding her slip gaily. Come along, Sir Charles, to the beechwood. We may even find an early primrose there."

She led the way talking with a gaiety long a stranger to her.

From the northeast corner of the house there stretched a long wall of solid masonry, or rather a stone facing to an embankment on top of which grew a thick wood of beeches that covered the hillside to the house. Below the embankment was the grass of the park, and farther from the house a damp, overgrown path, arched with shrubbery. Gillian parted the bushes and led the way along the sodden grass-grown gravel. The path was dreary, cold and shady. Sir Charles wondered that she chose it.

"I've never been here," she said, answering his thoughts. "We'll go up into the wood presently. It is horrible and dark here, isn't it?"

It was, but he would have braved rivers of mud for the girl at his side. He went on before her, parting the wet, overgrown branches and then pulled up, standing.

Before him, utterly unsuspected, unknown, lay a great black pool, under the very foot of the wall, cutting off their path.

There was no outlet from it, no stream apparently running into it, and yet instead of lying dull and stagnant, it was swirling violently. Streaks and beads of white foam lay on it, sticks and dead leaves flew around it as if in a whirlpool.

"What a beastly place!" Surprise and a queer horror of the evil-looking water made his voice low. "Don't go on, Miss Hamilton! We'd have to go round this thing and the ground doesn't look solid."

But Gillian did not seem to hear him.

"It's it! The stream!" she said, excited, incoherent. "We've found it."

"Found what?" he really began to think his wits wanting. Then he gave a short exclamation.

The red-haired maid, whom he had thought behind them, was in front of them, standing by the very edge of the pool, close to the stained yellow masonry of the embankment that towered twelve feet high. He could just see the sunlight through the stems of the beeches that grew on its summit, on clean, dry ground. The girl had her back to him and was gazing not at the horrid pool, but at the stone embankment. As he looked she turned and came quickly to her mistress, edging by the wall as if she were afraid of being seen.

"Go back!" she whispered, grasping Gillian's arm, pulling her behind the drooping branches that hid the end of the path where it came on the black water.

From Our Daily Mail

Lodiburg, Ky.:—Before I became a student of your Institute, I was just a plain country woman and like thousands of other women, I was self-conscious. I never wanted to go anywhere, for fear my clothes were not what other folks were wearing. I knew they looked cheap, for I could not afford to buy the things I wanted at the prices being asked.

But now, what a difference. My friends all rave over my pretty dresses. To know if they were sincere, I made a dress for my sister, and in less than a week, I had orders for eight dresses to make for her friends.

It has only cost me one half as much as before and now I am proud of my clothes, where I formerly was ashamed of them. MINNIE M. PELTIER.

The Years Between

By Itha M. Davis

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

HORTENCE Egle stood shading her eyes with one dimpled hand, intently watching a fishing smack that was slowly beating its way in. Her father was one of the many fishermen who ply their trade up and down the Maine coast, and was as honest as any preacher who ever stood in a pulpit. But to Hortence, who had received a better education than most of the children of the fisher folks, it was a dirty and disagreeable way to make a living, and she had tried every way to persuade him to leave the sea. He had been born in the brown cottage they still called home and he knew little else, so she watched for him constantly in bad weather and hating it worse every day.

She was beautiful to look upon, with the same tawny eyes of her stalwart father, the long, curving lashes, the wind-blown hair, so dark and curly, and her rosebud of a mouth was a face for which another Mark Anthony might fling away a world.

And that Mark was near, he came down from the big summer home on the hill overlooking the little hamlet, and stood looking at the girl in astonishment. Then as he took a step toward her she turned and the big, childish, tawny eyes met the blue eyes of the stranger. But they were in plain sight of the boat that the girl knew was her father's, and knowing his hatred of the men that summered there in idleness, she turned and fled; while he stood watching the fleeing form and wondered what had frightened her.

With the beaching of the boat, he turned his attention to the occupants but there was only one man. Big and with shoulders as broad as a barn door, he carried himself as a king might, and his eyes were of the same tawny color as the girl's. This Guy Clary knew that Old Hugh Egle, father of the beautiful dark creature who had fled at his approach; and he, owner of one of the finest summer homes on the coast, town houses, a yacht that was simply a floating palace, and an unlimited bank account, was not used to members of the gentle sex taking one wild look at him and then flying, and the more he thought of her the more determined he was to see and know her. He was engaged to one of the butterflies of his own set but that did not deter him, that was a matter of convenience arranged by his lady mother.

His chance came next day when he strolled down to the beach to watch the boats come in. She was almost in the same place where he had first seen her, with restless eyes turned seaward for a first glimpse of the boats.

He went quickly to her side lest she take flight before he had a chance to reassure her. "Miss Egle, I think," he spoke softly, hat in hand. "I did not mean to startle you yesterday but you were gone so quickly I did not have a chance to apologize."

"It was not that so much," was the shy answer, and he was amazed at her charming voice, "but father does not allow me to talk to strangers."

"Oh! I see, but I can hardly be called a stranger. You know who I am, don't you?"

"Guy Clary, I think," with a glance from her tawny eyes that set his heart racing. "Father pointed you out to me the day you and your friends came."

"What time does your father usually get in?" he asked as a matter of safety.

"It will not be long now for he said this morning he looked for a heavy gale tonight, and he knows how Elspeth and I worry when he is out." He stood looking at her in silence, wishing he might see her clothed in "purple and fine linen" as was hers by right of her beautiful face and perfect form.

"I will go before they come in," he told her, in sudden resolve to spare her what reproaches his presence might bring. "But will you not meet me tomorrow? I am a half-way likable chap, if your father does disapprove of my ways of living." There was a pleading note in his voice, his blue eyes tender.

"I am always somewhere about, watching for father is about all I do." So the old, old story was repeated. He spent every hour with her that her father spent out with the boats.

At the end of his mother's and fiance's visit he escorted them back to Boston, returning to the little fishing hamlet by the next train, and that evening before the boats came in there was a quiet wedding in the humble church of the fisher folk, and Guy Clary, the last of an old aristocratic family, took his plebian bride to the stately home of his ancestors.

He met the incoming boat and told Hugh Egle the whole story, and asked forgiveness for both of them. But Old Hugh stood staring at him in stunned silence until the voice of the younger man ceased; then he raised his huge, hairy hand to Heaven and spoke in such a cold, vindictive volce that Guy felt like an icy wind had passed over him: "I have never known any good to come from such a marriage, but I tell you this, if you ever mistreat her or neglect her in any way—and I will watch every move you may make from this day on—I will cut your hide in strips from your body, so help me God." He dropped his hand and strode away to the weather-beaten cottage, while Guy returned to his bride of an hour and told of her father's wrath.

As the months passed Hortence found herself in possession of more lovely clothes and jewels than she had ever heard of, and the bleak months of that winter were like fairy-land. But at the beginning of hot weather Guy received a letter from his mother informing him of her coming to spend the summer as usual. She did not even mention Hortence, her son's wife might have been the laundress for all of the attention she ever received, and though he dreaded her coming in one way, he hoped much good would also be done, for Hortence was so beautiful and loving no one could dislike her.

But alas for his high hopes, she brought Cleo Morely with her, his one-time fiancee and the girl he jilted. And his mother never let a chance slip to make unfavorable comparison between them, the fisherman's daughter was no match for the age-wise women of the world. So between them Hortence soon learned the reason of their hostility toward her, and one night after an unusually trying day with them she turned on her husband and accused him of bringing those "immoral females" to her home, and making her life so miserable she would be forced to go.

Then before any of them recovered from their astonishment at her outbreak, she turned on them with flaming cheeks and flashing eyes and cursed them with every oath and vile word she had ever heard in her twenty years of life on the coast, then, turning, fled out into the night down the rocky path to her father's house. There she fell unconscious on the step and the loving old father gathered the dear form of his daughter in strong arms and carried her to her own bed. While he hurried for the old doctor, Elspeth undressed and got her between sheets, where she did not recover consciousness until the doctor had worked over her for hours.

And that night a baby boy was born in old Hugh Egle's cottage, that night a soul went out from it. Hortence died, died as her mother had before her, without a sight of the sturdy little one she had laid down her life for. The old doctor that had ushered her in this world closed her eyes, in passing, then straightening her pain-twisted limbs he drew the quilt up over the pallid face, and turned to his lifelong friend. "I can do no more for her, Hugh, so I will go and send you help, Elspeth will need someone."

"No, you won't," the old fisherman cried harshly. "She shall be buried from her husband's house, as is her rights. I am just taking her, maybe you had better come along." He stooped over the silent form and wrapped the quilts around her, then holding her close to him they went out into the gray of the morning, up the steep, rocky path to the home she had so lately left.

They were admitted by the butler, who had spent the night in watching, for he knew there was trouble as the master had never gone to his bed. He led the way silently to the room she had so loved in life; here the half-crazed father laid her down, then he stooped and kissed the cold lips. As he turned from his last good by, Guy and his mother, followed by Cleo, came in. He faced the older woman with murder in his eyes. "There she is, you old hell cat, out of reach of your dirty tongue forever. If you were a man I would choke the life from your lying throat and throw you in the bay; and I hope that never again will you know peace, and the sight of her dead face will haunt you until your hair turns white and your body dries up." Here the doctor caught him by the arm and hurried him out. They went silently back to the desolate house where Elspeth was alternately crying and crooning over the sturdy little tawny-eyed morsel of humanity that Hortence had left them.

Three days later Guy Clary's beautiful wife was buried with all the ceremony and respect befitting a Clary, then when everything was over Guy went down to the cottage to demand his son. But the cottage was silent and deserted, and forcing a door he went into the rooms that had been hastily but effectively dismantled. Nothing but a very few of the heaviest pieces of furniture remained, and upon investigation he found Old Hugh had straightened up all of his business in the little hamlet, but had told no one his destination, they could only imagine. He had loaded his fishing smack with as much of his belongings as it would accommodate, and drifted out with the tide, taking Elspeth and the heir of the Clary millions with him.

* * * * *

Then two years later a little dark woman with a smooth, parchment-like skin, and a big, burly, tawny-eyed fisherman sat staring at a Boston paper in their little brown cottage nestled in the hills, not far from New Jersey's fishing coast; for there where all might read was a marriage notice that "Guy Clary, age twenty-eight, and Cleo Morely, age twenty-six, were married at the home of the groom's mother, July fourth." They looked into each other's eyes in silence then to the curly-haired two-year-old boy who was piling up his blocks with unsteady hands.

* * * * *

Ten years drifted quietly by, uneventful years to the Clary household on the cliffs, except after one of Cleo's long stays in town she brought a blue-eyed baby home and presented it as hers. Guy bowed down and worshiped the little fair-haired stranger as a God, for it was a well-known fact that there was no love between the present wife and himself, and that in his remorse and despair he had made daily pilgrimages to the little cemetery where Hortence lay sleeping. His temples were gray and his manner listless. He had just two interests in life, one was that some day he would find the boy of Hortence, the other was his little daughter Tina.

He watched all the different fishing boats these past twelve years, and at last a boat strange in those waters beat her way in and anchored close by. Six strange men came over her side and a casket was lowered to them, then a minister and two singers followed, and the procession went straight to the little cemetery where a grave had been prepared. There the minister read from a slip of paper folded inside his prayerbook, "Elspeth Von, spinster, died July tenth, age eighty-nine." Not a word about where she died or whom her friends might be. After the short service Guy talked to the men, but they were noncommittal. No, they didn't know where she died but thought some hospital; yes, certainly they had been hired to bring the body in, and before he could detain them lawfully they had all gone back to the boat and pushed off. And he was no nearer solving the mystery of Hugh Egle's disappearance than he had been twelve years before.

The elder Mrs. Clary had been a helpless cripple for five years, a trained nurse was always in attendance to wheel or carry her back and forth from her bed to the window. She had not sat at the table with her son and daughter-in-law not even once in all those long, bleak years. She was only a wreck of the woman whose cruelty had driven Hortence, her only son's dearly beloved wife, out into the night, seeking care and protection from her old father.

"But even he would pity me and maybe revoke that awful curse if he could see my suffering and repentance. Oh! Hortence, forgive, forgive, I did not know what I was doing, just let me hold your boy in my arms once and I can die in peace," she sobbed audibly and despairingly, and the nurse came quietly from an inner room and stood at her side. She knew of course she could give no help, for who can administer to a diseased mind, but she stroked the white hair softly. She knew the whole story and knew the son's wife had banished the old lady to these secluded rooms because she could not endure such a skeleton at the table. The son had never forgiven her, scarcely tolerated her under the roof. Though he had married her arch conspirator, he put all the blame on his mother, and had even objected to Tina's daily visits to her "Granny," but Tina paid no attention to his reprimands or her mother's fault finding.

She had just celebrated her eighteenth birthday and was carrying Granny some of her cake and candies when the old white-haired butler called to her from the front hall. "Miss Tina, here is a young man who wants to see your father, but he will not be back until tomorrow so he says he would like to talk to your grandmother."

"All right, Seward, I am just going to see her, I will show him up." She halted a passing maid and bade her take the tray along, while she escorted the visitor. Seward came in advance of the visitor, his face white, his eyes beseeching, and Tina seeing his troubled look turned to the big, well-dressed man following. The wide open tawny eyes with their long dark lashes, that wavy hair and laughing mouth could belong to but one person, her brother, the child of Hortence, that her father and poor old Granny had grieved for some knowledge of ever since she could remember. Just a few seconds she stared with unbelieving eyes, then ran to him crying, "You are my brother, I know you are my big, big brother, you are just like that picture in papa's room." She flung both arms around his neck and pressed soft lips to him, and the astonished man held her tiny form close and gazed down into the blue eyes that were so mistily tender.

* * * * *

"Well, I guess I belong to the family all right and I have known for several years that there was a little sister, but I was not expecting such a dear welcome as this. I promised Elspeth before she died that I would come as soon as daddy would give up for me to."

"Come on and see Granny," she cried, holding to his hand, her eyes shining. "She has prayed every day since I can remember, just to live to see you. You stand right here until I go in and tell her, she is an invalid, you see." She went in, leaving the door ajar so he could hear when she called; she crossed the room hurriedly and threw her arms around the frail old form, drawing the white head close to her breast.

"Granny, granny dear, there is somebody out here who wants to see you, guess who," but her voice was so excited Granny knew this was no casual visitor, and her mind flew to possibilities. She clung to the girl's little hands and tried to get upon her feet, her poor, useless feet that had not borne her weight in years.

"Tina, tell me, tell me quick, has our boy come home, the little baby we never saw? Tina, dear, don't kill your Granny," the quavering voice failed, and Tina called in excitement, "Come to me, come right in, Granny wants you; there, now look at him, he is no baby now, and I will not have but half a Granny."

He crossed the room and took the half-fainting form from the girl's slender arms. "Why, Granny," he whispered, kissing the tremulous old face softly, "I never dreamed of scaring you like this or I should never have come. Do I look as bad as all that?"

"Oh, no! darling boy, you look good to me, how good you can never know, you are the perfect image of your beautiful mother. Her very eyes and hair and her sweet, laughing mouth, but I killed her. Oh! dear boy, did they tell you that I am a murderess, just as surely as if I had plunged a knife in her heart? After she was dead, her father carried her back here, and over

Dishes for January Weather

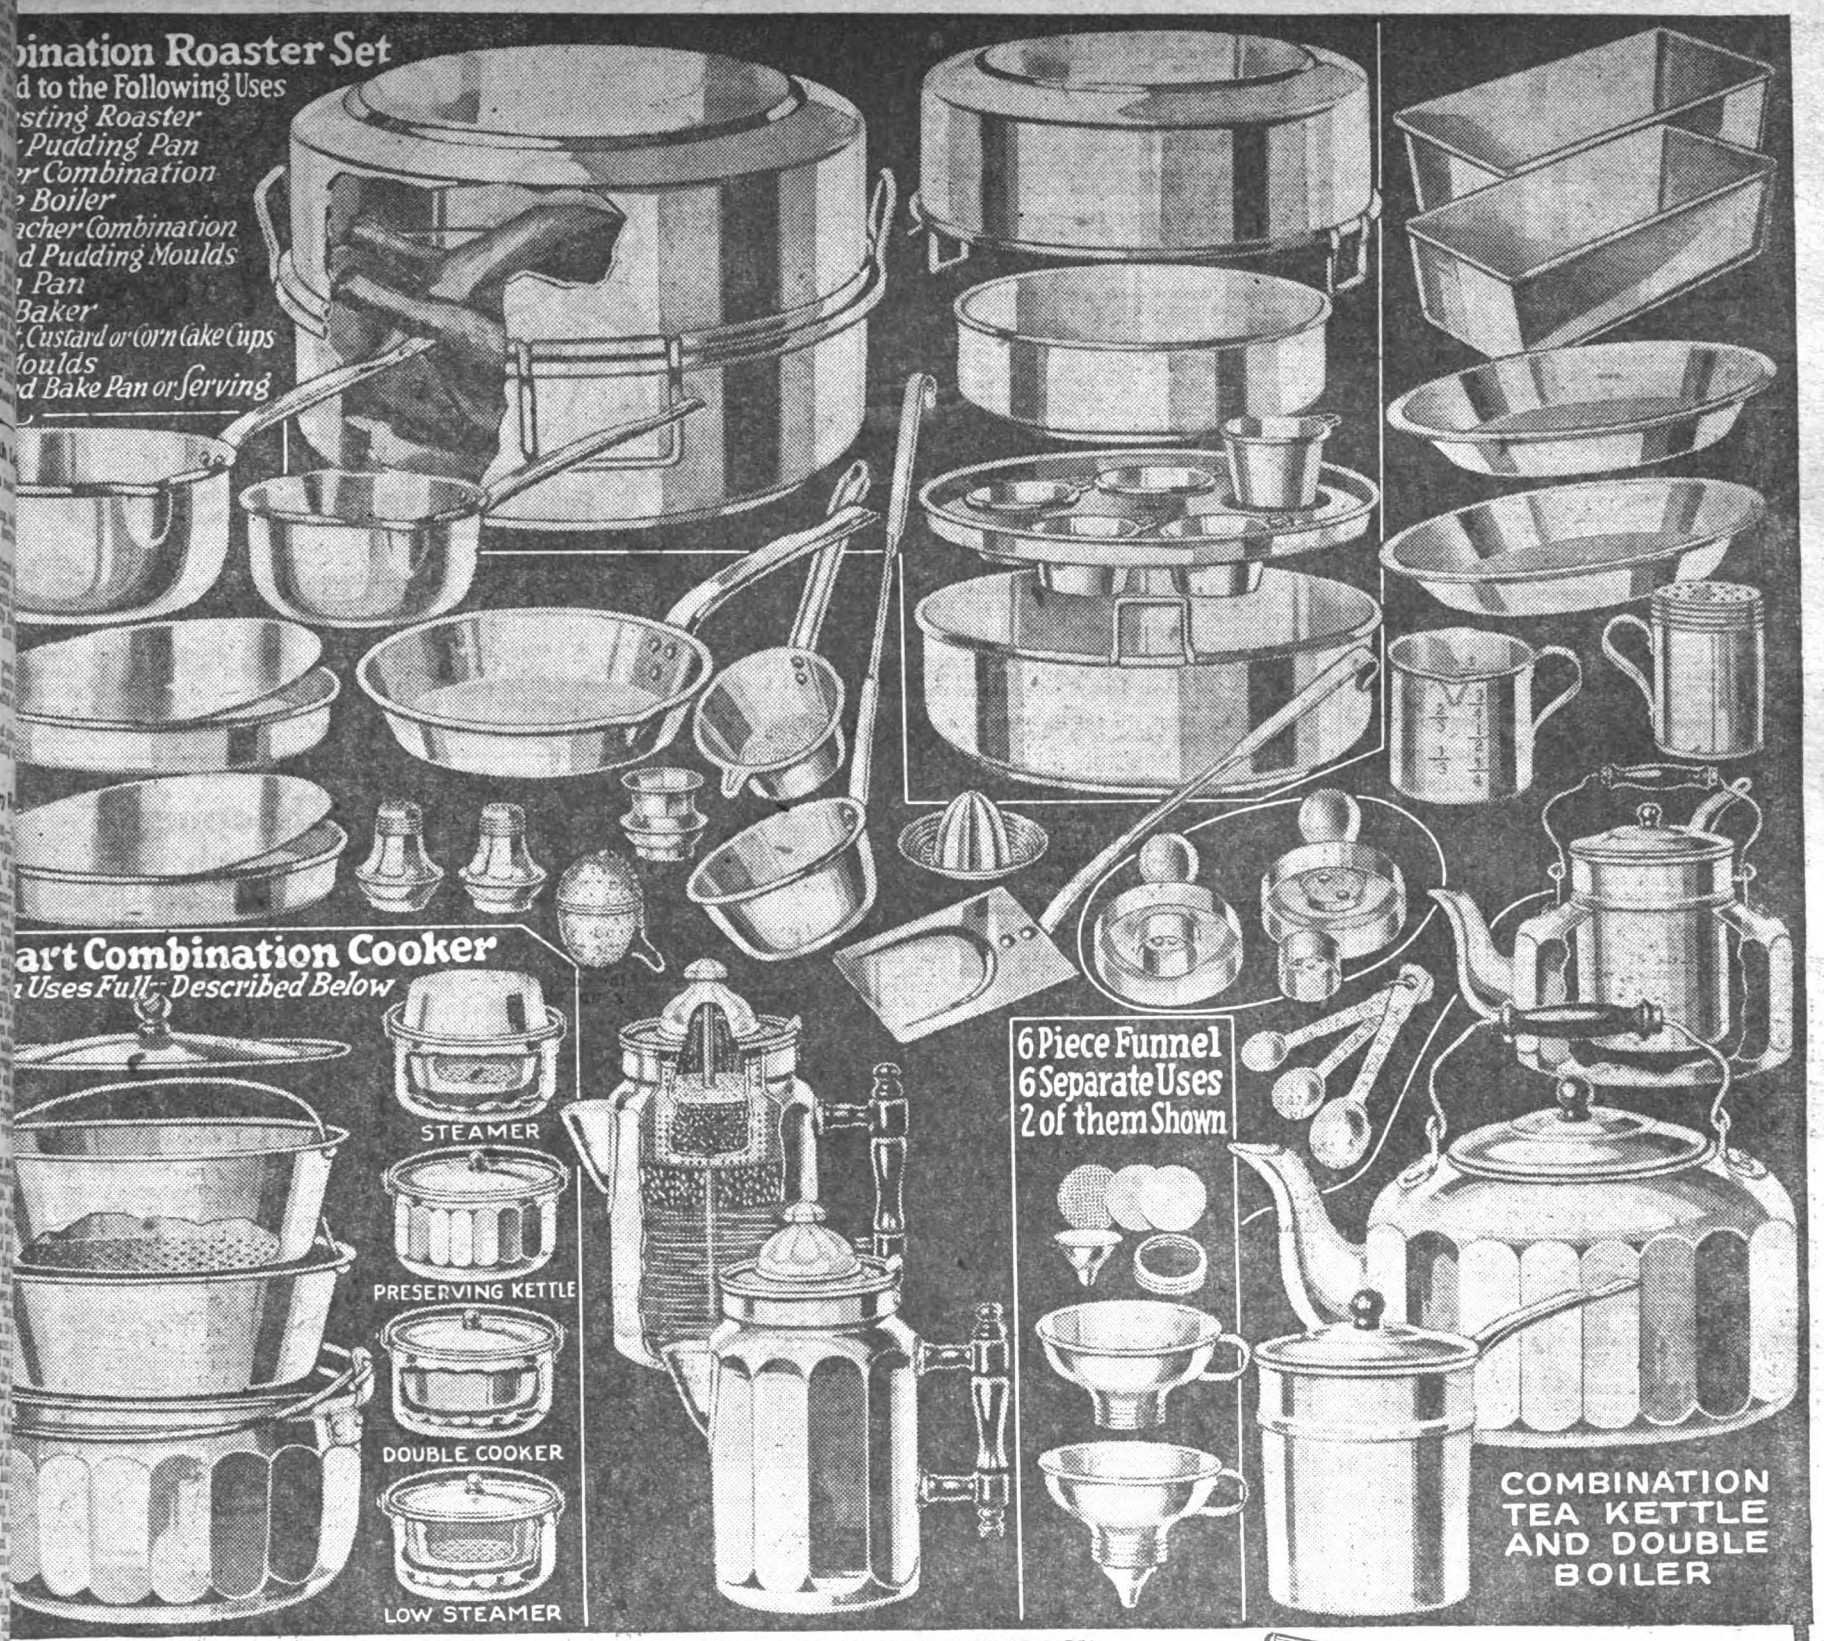
NEW ENGLAND BOILED DINNER.—The best corned beef is corned in the kettle while cooking. Select the brisket or second cut of rattleran, cover with boiling water well salted. Bring to a boil, set on back of stove and simmer until tender, taking care that the water does not cease bubbling at any time. Remove from liquor. The vegetables usually cooked in a boiled dinner are cabbage, turnip, beets, carrots and potatoes. The beets are cooked separately as they color the water. The vegetables are put into the beef liquor according to the time required for cooking, carrots and turnips first, and when about half done the cabbage and potatoes are added. The vegetables must be well done. Scrape and cut the carrots in two lengthwise, pare and slice the turnips, pare the potatoes and cut the cabbage into sections. Storage beets usually require two hours cooking. Serve the meat and vegetables on the same platter.

BAKED BEANS.—The following method of cooking beans will be especially acceptable to those who find baked beans indigestible. Soak the dry beans 12 hours in cold water to which soda has been added, one-fourth teaspoon to the quart. Wash the beans out of this water and put on to parboil in fresh cold water to which the same amount of soda has been added. After half an hour of boiling the skins will begin to loosen and frequent stirrings will assist in peeling them from the beans. When well parboiled, skim the beans from the soda water into fresh cold water, and rub between the hands. The skins will rise to the surface and can be poured off. In the bottom of a bean pot or other earthen dish that covers closely, put about one-fourth pound of salt pork to each pint of dry beans. Add the beans. Season with one tablespoon of sugar, one tablespoon of molasses, and one scant teaspoon of salt when the beans are about two-thirds done. Add boiling water to cover. Bake eight hours in an oven that keeps the beans cooking very slowly. Many like a small whole onion put in the bottom of the pot, also half a teaspoon of mustard.

FINNAN HADDIE.—Lay fish cut into serving portions in an agate pan, cover with equal parts of milk and cold water. Set on the back of the stove for half an hour, in which time it should just reach the simmering point. Drain, spread with butter, sprinkle lightly with bread-crumbs and bake twenty minutes. Baste two or three times with a little hot milk.

FISH-CAKES.—One heaping cup of cooked fish shredded fine, two cups of fresh boiled potato mashed, one well-beaten egg, and enough cream or milk to make the mixture the consistency of mashed potato when beaten all together. Season with salt and pepper. Drop by spoonfuls into deep fat and fry brown.

ENGLISH VEAL ROAST.—Cover the bottom of the roasting-pan with a layer of sliced onion and tomato, a little minced parsley and chopped celery, and three tablespoons of beef fat. Rub a loin roast with softened butter and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Lay it onto the vegetables and roast until tender, basting frequently with the juice in the pan. Remove the roast, and slightly thicken the vegetable juices, then pour it all around the roast in a platter. If canned tomato is used there will be plenty liquid, otherwise it may be necessary to gradually add a cup of hot water during the cooking.



CITRUS MARMALADE.—One orange, one lemon and one grapefruit cut into very thin slices. Choice fruit should be used. Measure, then add two and one-half times the measure of water, and let it stand for 24 hours. Boil rapidly until tender, then measure again and add an equal amount of granulated sugar. Boil rapidly until it thickens.

APPLE SHORTCAKE.—Cream one-fourth cup of butter, gradually add one-half cup of sugar and one well beaten egg. Sift two teaspoons of baking powder and one-fourth teaspoon of salt with one cup of sifted flour and add to the above mixture alternately with one-fourth cup of milk. Spread in a round tin and cover with tart apples cut into eighths. Sprinkle generously with sugar, and a little cinnamon if the flavor is liked. Bake in a fairly hot oven until well browned and the apple is done.

WINTER RELISH.—Put one quart of tender celery, one quart of cabbage and one large onion through the food chopper and mix well with one-fourth cup of salt. Let stand 30 minutes then put into a colander to drain. To one pint of vinegar add one-half cup of brown sugar and the following spices tied in a bag: Four bay leaves, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, six whole cloves, one-half teaspoon of celery seed, one tablespoon of white mustard seed, and one-half teaspoon of whole white pepper. Simmer ten minutes in a tightly covered agate dish and pour over the drained vegetables. Good after two weeks. Does not require sealing.

ESCALLOPED VEGETABLES.—Six good-sized carrots, two onions, two turnips, three potatoes and one-third cup of beef suet all put through the food chopper. It is well first to cut the suet into small pieces and gradually add it to the vegetables. Put an inch layer of the mixture into a baking dish, sprinkle with flour and add salt. Repeat until all is used, then pour fresh milk over the top until it just appears at the edges. Bake one and one-half hour in a moderate oven. Do not boil.

STUFFED BEETS.—Boil beets of uniform size until thoroughly done. Scoop out the centers until a half-inch thick shell remains. Soak dried lima beans over night. Slip off the skins, cover the beans with cold water and slowly cook until soft, taking care they do not burn. Skim out the beans and stir into the juice equal parts of butter and dry flour mixed together to thicken. Return the beans to the stewpan, cook five minutes and fill the beet shells. Sprinkle the tops with bread-crumbs, dot with butter and brown in the oven.

Scarlet Fever

WE choose this disease as the subject for this month's talk, but do not wish to convey to the mothers the idea that we think they can treat a baby or older child that has scarlet fever, but hope to impress upon mothers the importance of knowing it if their baby does have the disease.

Scarlet fever is an infectious disease, that is, it is given from one person to another, and in every state where they have a health board they quarantine the patient or at least isolate him. Nursing babies rarely take the disease, even if in an epidemic, although bottle-fed babies are not so immune; why this is so we do not know. The period of time that you would expect to elapse from the time of exposure until the first symptoms show up, vary from eight to 10 days.

One attack, almost without exception, removes the liability of another.

There is some doubt as to just what time in the disease that it is the most contagious, and we cannot positively answer this question, but it is always best to isolate the patient from the time of the first sigh of the disease until he is through peeling or expoliating. It may be possible that the secretions and the breath may give the disease and the mother should bear this in mind, especially if she has not had the disease herself. If the mother takes the disease herself she is liable to be a great deal sicker than the baby was, and this is true of all children's diseases, viz., scarlet fever, mumps, whooping-cough and measles.

There is always a feeling of relief when our babies have had all these children's diseases as we know it renders them immune, and although this is a relief, I cannot advise a mother to expose her baby even to get this relief.

The complications that may arise in any simple disease make this a reckless thing to do. It is the possibilities, not the probabilities, that cause us the most worry. These possibilities are the reasons why a mother should know that her child has scarlet fever and not some simple eruption like hives or nettle rash.

Even the mildest case of scarlet fever may take on an inflammation of the kidneys that will end fatally or impair the baby's health through life.

The frequency of the disease makes it important that a mother should know enough about the rash to recognize it if she does see it.

The disease occurs most often in the spring and autumn, but may occur at any time.

In some of the epidemics the disease is of a very malignant type and very serious but late years the cases we see are of a mild type.

Scarlet fever is characterized by high fever, rapid pulse, and scarlet rash all over the body, a blush, and what I mean by this is that if you press on the rash with your finger it disappears and returns when you remove the pressure.

Hives and measles and most of the eruptions are on the skin, not under it, and this is an important point to remember.

There is usually more or less throat trouble and in a severe case canker appears in the throat that causes a great deal of discomfort and choking. This is why the disease is sometimes called canker rash.

When the mother discovers that her baby has a rash on body under the skin, with fever and sore throat, she has reason to be alarmed and should send for a physician.

A mild case is a trivial matter, but in severe cases there is nothing more malignant or fatal. The tongue in scarlet fever has a characteristic appearance, as it is red with raised points, called "strawberry tongue."

On the fourth or fifth day, if without any complications, the fever declines, the eruption fades, and on the fifth to eighth day the peeling or exfoliating begins.

This continues for a week or more and in some cases for several weeks.

The fact that so many cases are not recognized or treated causes it to spread, and without much doubt many of the complications of babies and children are caused by scarlet fever of a mild kind untreated.

The mildness of the attack does not eliminate the danger of kidney complications. I repeat the statement previously made, if any of you mothers suspect that your baby, or in fact any member of your family, has scarlet fever, isolate the patient from the rest of the family, keep them in a quiet room, warm, give simple diet largely milk, get a physician and have urine examined often to see that there is no kidney involvement. Older authorities told us to look out for dropsical conditions, but it is better not to wait for this as chemical analysis of urine will show trouble long before the dropsy appears.

Do not be satisfied with one examination, but have urine examined frequently all through the course of the disease.

Questions and Answers

SORE NIPPLES.—When I am nursing my babies the nipples get very sore, and would like to know if there is anything I can do during pregnancy to prevent this?

MRS. A. B., Auburndale, Wis.

A.—During pregnancy be careful to not flatten nipples by pressure from corsets. Harden during the later weeks of pregnancy with alcohol, with a little tannin in it. If sore while nursing, use nipple shield, paint with compound tincture of benzoin. Nitrate of lead twenty grains to one ounce of lanolin, is good to rub on during pregnancy, but must not be used after baby is born, as it might poison him.

CATARRHAL COUGH.—My two-year-old girl has a cough and cannot breathe at night. Have taken her to a clinic and they said she had rickets, and suggested Maltine and Cod Liver Oil, but it does not help her much.

MRS. J. B., So. Norfolk, Va.

A.—The Maltine and Cod Liver Oil is good treatment and I should continue it. In addition should give her, three times a day, half-teaspoonful doses of Syrup of Hydriodic Acid in water.

Also have throat examined for diseased tonsils and adenoids.

RINGWORM OF SCALP.—I have a little girl who has a ringworm on her scalp and have tried most everything on it without relief. Will the hair come back that has gone on scalp?

MRS. J. W. P., Wilmington, N. C.

A.—Wash part with saturated solution of boric acid, then apply sulphur ointment. Paint around the edges with tincture of iodin. Yes, the hair will come back.

BLUE BABY, PARALYSIS.—Am writing for aid for my thirteen-months-old baby who has leakage of the heart, and at times she has sinking spells, or gets sleepy. Her pulse is very fast if she does not feel well. Would you advise heart stimulants? Her weight is seventeen pounds. Is this what she should weigh?

A few weeks ago, when cutting teeth, she suddenly became paralyzed, first leg, then arm. Could this have been caused by the teeth?

MRS. J. D. D., Clarissa, Minn.

A.—Taking into consideration what your baby has had to contend with since birth, think her weight gratifying, but am not clear as to the cause of the paralysis. Your baby should have heart stimulants. Digitalis, I think, is indicated, but under careful supervision by a physician to watch results. Should suspect infantile paralysis, but if care is taken there will be no after results. A hospital would be an ideal place for baby for a while.

ECZEMA.—Can you suggest anything that will help my ten-months-old baby who has eczema all over his body, rough with scales, then cracks open and bleeds?

MRS. H. S. H., Dunnegan, Mo.

A.—There are many forms of eczema and from your letter it is hard to decide just what kind your baby is suffering from.

Would suggest giving baby two-drop doses, three times a day, of tincture of chloride of iron, and bathe parts locally with Dakins' solution, one per cent., then apply sulphur ointment. Use white castile soap to wash baby.

UMBILICAL HERNIA.—My girl is eighteen months old, and the navel bulges out, and at times she lies down and strains as if she were in pain from gas. Can it be that this is gas, and what can I do for her?

MRS. T. M. P., Hampton, Iowa.

A.—Without much doubt the cause of your baby's trouble is the hernia. Get your physician to show you how to relieve this with adhesive plaster and button covered with gauze or cotton, holding the parts in place.

WORMS, RHEUMATISM.—What can I do for my four-year-old girl who picks her nose, and bites her fingernails?

Can the cause be worms, and what can I do for relief?

What can I do for my knee and leg, as sometimes in the night they pain me badly, and feel as if the bone was being crushed.

MRS. E. E. B., Okla City.

A.—Your girl may have worms and they may cause this nervousness. You can soon find out if this is the cause.

Give her one-half grain each of calomel and santonin, every three hours, until bowels are free, then examine stools.

Teaspoonful of salt to pint of water given as enema will relieve pinworms.

For your rheumatism, take two five-grain tablets of sodium salicylate after each meal; drink lots of water. Locally, rub Iodex with methyl salicylate on the parts that are painful.

BEDWETTING.—Will you tell me what to do for my twelve-year-old boy who wets the bed every night? The urine has a highly acid smell.

MRS. L. G., Epping, N. Dak.

A.—Please read October COMFORT; have urine examined in your boy's case.

PICKING NAVEL.—What makes my three-year-old girl pick her navel? She has done this for a year and at times it gets irritated.

MRS. C. N. M., Long Beach, Cal.

A.—This is one of the unexplainable habits that children take up. Some babies will not nurse or eat without taking hold of their ear. Patient, persistent effort, gently used, will break her of the habit.

SKIN ERUPTION.—My two girls have some skin disease; skin is very rough and cracks, scabs form and the parts look angry.

MRS. D. B. R., Muncey, Pa.

A.—Should give the girls three-drop doses of tincture of chloride of iron, in syrup, three times a day, after meals.

Locally, should bathe parts with Dakins' solution, then apply sulphur ointment.

IRRITATED NAVEL.—My three-weeks-old baby, who I am nursing, has a red enlargement, where cord was tied, that discharges

There is a bulging out that enlarges when baby cries. Baby cries a great deal with gas, but I have gas myself. What shall I do for the navel and for the gas?

MRS. E. W. G., Spencer, Ind.

A.—Should advise washing navel once a day with one per cent. Dakins' solution, then dust on a little powdered boric acid, or sulphur.

If this does not relieve, have red spot touched up with nitrate of silver stick. I do not consider it good judgment to allow this rupture to go unattended and if you cannot relieve and hold it in place with button and adhesive plaster, have an umbilical truss made that will hold in place.

Crying is bad for rupture, as it may enlarge it. For the gas, get your own digestion in good condition and the baby's will be also.

Avoid acid fruits, rich pastry and gravies, and after each meal take two teaspoonfuls of Elix Lactated Pepsin.

WEANING BABY.—When should I wean my baby who is now eight months old? Should I wean her gradually or at once and how shall I dry up the milk?

MRS. J. S., Marshall, Minn.

A.—Wean baby when it is eleven months old. Should wean her quickly, when you begin. Bandaging the breasts snugly to the chest with dry diet for a few days, soon dries up milk secretion.

COUGH, MORNING SICKNESS.—My three-year-old boy has hard cough, especially when lying down. There is no history of tuberculosis on either side of the family. What can I do for morning sickness?

MRS. J. F. C., Oxford, Ohio.

A.—For the cough, should give your three-year-old boy one-half teaspoonful doses of Syrup of Hydriodic Acid, three times a day, well diluted with water. Have nose and throat examined for adenoids or enlarged diseased tonsils.

Morning sickness is a sympathetic disturbance and often is an obstinate symptom to relieve. You should avoid all excitement sexual and otherwise; keep bowels regular, eat food easy to digest.

Have seen an abdominal binder, giving slight upward and inward pressure, give relief.

salt mines, and oil wells in almost every part of the state. Our farm products are rice, cotton, corn, sugar cane, potatoes and all kinds of vegetables.

How many have heard of the beautiful Evangeline Oak on the banks of the Bayou Teche? It is near my home and there are benches around the tree where people sit and rest.

What's the matter with the men? I enjoy reading their letters.

Have any of the sisters ever taken correspondence courses and were they successful? I am taking a course and find it very good.

Here's a help for teachers. Wash your blackboards with a mixture of kerosene and vinegar and you will be surprised at the results.

I always enjoy descriptions so will give you one of myself. My height is about five feet, five inches, weight 125 pounds. I have medium brown hair, gray eyes, a fair complexion and am not old enough to vote, but of course I'm going to vote when I can.

I would like very much to receive letters from those who care to write and will try to answer all I get. I would enjoy postcards of views from all over the country to use in my geography class.

This is not my first attempt to sit with you.

Your friend, MINA SPELL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Did I hear someone asking for Christmas suggestions? Maybe I can give a few. There are many things for housekeepers, crocheted or embroidered doilies are always useful. Those who cannot embroider can surely do the applique work and this is very attractive. Dresser scarfs made from unbleached muslin and embroidered or appliqued in bright colors are pretty and serviceable. Bind edge or work in blanket stitch. Pincushions are also easily made. If you do not care to take the time to make an embroidered top, cover a pretty piece of silk with lace or net, put on a narrow edge of lace and a bow of ribbon to match silk. Doll girl who has a room of her own. Get small china or celluloid dolls, make a circle of cardboard and cover with silk or sateen. Gather a straight piece of the goods to this. Run a gathering thread in top and stuff with wool or cotton, placing the doll in the center. Gather cushion around the doll's waist, leaving the arms free. Take a piece of camisole lace, the length of four points, run a ribbon through the beading and tie in bow at back. Fasten one point at each side of the doll and on point in front and back. The effect is charming. Nothing pleases a small girl better than clothing or bedding for her favorite doll and these may generally be made from scraps. Handkerchiefs never wear their welcome out and even the little tots like them. Camisoles, aprons, collar-and-cuff sets, yokes, towels, table runners and handkerchief cases are other gifts always welcome. Most of these need not be expensive. Make as many things alike as you can and the material will not cost so much. For instance, one and one-half yards of thirty-six inch muslin will make two dresser scarfs and you would have to buy that much for one anyway.

If any of the sisters know how to fix prepared mustard at home, will you please tell me how to do it.

I will describe myself and then go. I am 22 years old, have dark brown hair and eyes, five feet, eight inches tall and weigh about 155 pounds. Have been married two and one-half years and have a sweet baby boy. His name is Donzol Ross.

How many of the sisters remember Mrs. Stella Nafus who wrote to this corner over a year ago? She is now in Colorado with tuberculosis. She says she is improving but gets homesick. Why not send her a card and letter shower. She will appreciate it you may be sure. Her address now is Mrs. Stella Nafus, 103 North 7th Street, Lamar, Colo. Her younger sister is also there with tuberculosis.

Love to all.

MRS. EDNA COLE.

BARTON, GEORGIA.

HELLO OLD DEARS:

I say "Old Dears" simply because I love each and every one of you. I have been married nearly six years and have always welcomed COMFORT at our home and long years ago my aunt used to take it so I learned to love it before I was grown. My subscription is paid for three years in advance.

Mrs. Pettis, I wish I could be like Aunt Polly and I mean to try from now on.

RUSSELL AND KATE SALTER.

Old Maid Sister, from Indiana, will you write to me? I have two children, a girl and a boy, and home wouldn't be home to me without them. I pray that I can always have them with me or near me. Kate is four years old and Russell, Jr., is two. Both are blondes. Everybody calls Russell "Buddie." I am sending a picture of them, taken when Kate was two years old and Russell only four months but weighing thirty pounds. They have always been healthy babies and no one has enjoyed their children more than I have. I have my hands full though and have a great many troubles and trials to bear but it does no good to grumble. Just ask God to help you and try to wear a smile. That is the best way to meet everything and everybody.

I will tell you how I look for I enjoy that part in other letters. I am five feet, six inches tall, weigh 157 pounds and have blue eyes, black hair and a fair complexion and am 23 years old.

We live one mile from a nice little town, on a splendid road, and own our own farm. Our house has six rooms and I want to remodel it when times get better.

I wish some of you dear folks would write to me for I get lonesome at times.

I have never written before but hope to see my babies smiling back at me when the next number comes.

Respectfully yours, MRS. R. J. SALTER.

Mrs. Salter.—Miss Kate is our very youngest flapper, with her rolled hose, bare knees and bobbed hair. Buddie is showing his brotherly displeasure by looking very stern in hopes to convince us that it isn't his fault, he just can't do a thing with her.—Ed.

MARBLEMOUNT, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

There are so many to write interesting letters that I hesitate to even bother you but I want to ask the sisters to write to me and to send me reading matter. There are many, I am sure, who have magazines they are done with. We are twenty miles and no car from the nearest news-stand and twenty-five cents a week and four dollars or so all at once are different.

The fall rains have started and as school is keeping I shall be "housefast all winter with three little ones that cannot be left alone. We are miles from neighbors and in midwinter the school children are gone from eight until five. My husband will be away working and lonesome is no name for it especially when the babies are asleep in the afternoon, and the long evenings. I can pay parcel post charges for the first two zones which include Washington and part of Oregon. We live way up among the mountains between Rockport and Marblemont, getting mail R. F. D. from either office; C. O. D. mail we have come to Marblemount, as it is nearer. It's just a store and post office and a few houses. Rockport is the end of the railroad. No one ever writes from hereabouts but they all used to take COMFORT. I say "used to" because my copies for the last four months were lent and are still traveling. I have hopes of getting them back. I shall be hurt if I don't, likewise if they are torn or mutilated. The mail man is the most popular man hereabouts, especially when COMFORT is due.

Sincerely, MRS. HELEN BUTLER.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I want some of the Christian sisters to advise me in my trouble for some may have had a similar experience. I have been married ten years, eight of which my husband and I got along beautifully. After that time my husband found it necessary to employ a girl to assist him in his business as my health would not permit me to work as I had. A woman whom I considered one of my best friends told me that her daughter could take my place, which she did and we became dear friends. In a few months I realized that my husband was infatuated with this girl who was beautiful and charming. I expressed my opinion but it only made my husband angry with me. Matters grew worse. I felt as long as I had no proof of their guilt I would keep quiet, if possible. I did not want to be unfair and if it were only jealousy on my part, it would be wronging her. She continued her visits to my home. I treated her right but kept my eyes open and finally, several days before the birth of my son, I had proof of his infidelity. They both plead for mercy and made all kinds of promises to me with only the desire that I would not

The Butterfly Girl

By Lilliace Montgomery Mitchell

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

GERTIE was undeniably a butterfly girl. Her pretty brown hair was always waved and curly, her frocks were always fluffy and soft and her fingers were always white and soft with glistening finger-tips. Gertie was not a rge girl; indeed, had one held her against the all and measured she probably would not have sen more than one or two inches past the five-ot mark. And Gertie was Milton Webb's steady rl.

Milton Webb was not, absolutely, of the butter- type. He worked in the shipping room of a rge mail-order house and when there was any pecially heavy box or crate the first call for aid cluded Milt invariably. According to the records at the mail-order house kept in its employment partment (which, by the way, had recently been -named personnel department), Milt was six et two, tipped the scales at two hundred flat id was a rugged piece of manhood well fitted r manual labor. Milt, however, while fitted for anual labor, had no desire to remain at the job ng. This was not due to laziness but rather to e fact that the "head-work" jobs paid better id Milt was anxious to earn a good salary. He udied feverishly at nights except on Wednesday id Sunday when he took Gertie out. He was udying accounting. While the work was not dif-cult for him it was tedious and often hour after our would pass while he checked and re-checked rtain debit and credit columns to strike a bal-ice. He was often so desperately tired when unday came that he would sit back on a park nch and just look at Gertie and wonder how e could be so gay and effervescent. It was that ry vivacity in Gertie that he loved. At such mes he longed to take her into his arms and ll her so, tell her that he wanted to get her a ng such as Minnie and Stella had. But the un-udied lessons that must be covered before he uld ask for a real job in the mail-order house al-ays arose before him and paraded unyieldingly. Gertie knew he was studying to "get some-here," but she had never studied enough to know at mental work often wears one out even more an physical labor. She did not understand why e seemed tired and listless, why he looked at er so oddly, why he said nothing. Sometimes venty minutes would pass without his having id a word. And it was one group of words in articular that Gertie wanted to hear. She often oked at her fourth finger and pondered over the ea that it was unfurnished. But when Milt said othing—well, she thought, what could she do?

And then one day she found a newspaper ar-cle that talked about the modern girl. It be-moaned the fact that the modern girl is never serious but is flirtatious and flighty; it belittled her dress, her mode of hairdressing, her make-up and her manner. Gertie staid awake long that night. It was Saturday night and Gertie knew that on the morrow she would see Milton. He should propose, she decided. From what the article said, girls and women were running human events and secured what they wanted at any cost.

"Well," said Gertie, settling her mouth into as straight a line as that cupid's bow could manage, "I want Milt. If I don't set to work and get him someone else will. Anybody'd fall in love with him at sight."

The next afternoon late when Milt had shaved and donned his Sunday suit for the outing, he called for Gertie. Just as he rang the bell he discovered mentally a place in his set of books that was "off." He knew that by remedying that spot his books would in all probability balance. When Gertie greeted him, therefore, he was pleasant but absent-minded. He followed her into the living-room and sat down. Gertie sat primly opposite him. He looked at her.

"Gert!" he exclaimed, his jaw dropping an inch. "Wh-wh-why, what's the matter?"

"Nothing," she said quietly. If tears were near the surface he should not know it, she determined.

"But—b-b-b-but, you look—sick—or—something," he stammered.

"Well?" she countered. "Well, don't you l-l——" and then the tears did come. And when Gertie cried she cried as she did everything else—heartily and loud.

"Why, Gert!" exclaimed the now thoroughly awakened Milt, "something is the matter! You just tell me what it is right off."

And so Gertie found herself running to her room for the newspaper clipping and stealing a glance in the mirror at the straight-haired, uncurled, unfluffy double that stared back at her gravely and unsmilingly before she closed the door. "You see," she told Milt, "it says that modern girls are butterflies and that no one sensible would care for that type of girl. It says you—I mean a girl shouldn't use any powder or —or anything and that the hair ought to be smooth and close and that ruffles should not be——"

But Milt was not listening; he was staring at her altered appearance. "Sa-a-ay," he broke in, "how long would it take you to get—you know—fixed up as usual? You may be a butterfly, all right, but it suits me. And, say, a fellow down at Merken's has a diamond he brought back from France and he and I have sort of been dickering about it for your ring. Suppose we go down so you can give it the o-o before I take it?"

And it was the old-time Gertie, the butterfly girl, who slipped a newspaper clipping into the top drawer of her dresser before she went out with Milt.

Comfort's League of Cousins

hen they were young, and I think your machine ust be one of the untrained sort. But they are ll tricky beasts. My typewriter, for instance, has wo or three university degrees, yet it prefers to ell "friend" as "f-r-e-i-n-d." It will do this ery possible time my back and fingers are rned. Yet the twists of your machine make our letter most interesting, Louise. It tells about at strange combination "brother sister" you ave, and gives us your age as "foufteen"—which take to mean that you are between fourteen and fteen, perhaps.

Louise, you were wise to warn me not to let illy see your letter. His rage would have been eyond description and his language past print. ill thinks all babies should be born with a spell-g book in their hands and a dictionary between heir lips. Yet I once caught his spelling "sepa-ate" with an "e" in the middle!

Thanks, Louise, for wishing us all "much jok." think your typewriter played much of a "jok" n you and the result gave us all "much joy"—hich is what you really wanted and meant to ay, I fancy. I know it gave me "much jok" to ead it, although I had to pick out a time when ill was in the Park. You certainly ran a great isk, Louise, but you escaped this time.

BENTON, KANSAS.

EAR UNCLE LISHA:

As we are taking COMFORT I am taking your advice, or I don't know what to do. I want to join the eague of Cousins and would like to write letters, but re take the COMFORT now and have for a long while, o please let me know how I can join the League with-ut subscribing. I remain, as ever,

Your niece, FONDA DEWITT.

You write a good little letter, Fonda, and if ou can write I'm pretty sure you can read too. o if you want to know how to get in the Happy unch, just read the rules which are printed in ig black-face type at the end of our department his and every other month. As your household s already a subscriber, all you need to do is to end in fifty-five cents to have this subscription xtended, in your name, one year from the date f its expiration. Fifty cents pays for COMFORT ne year, and the extra nickel gives you your embership in the League of Cousins. It brings ou your League button, your membership cer-ificate, your number in the Big Family, and laces your name on our League letter list. Once member, Fonda, you are always a member. We ave no annual dues but love and loyalty: Love or each other and loyalty to the principles for hich our Big Family was founded and exists. We are probably the greatest society of young eople on earth, Fonda,—and it's a dead sure hing we are the happiest. Big as our circle is here is always room for one more and we are lways glad to "move over" and give a newcomer place and a smile of welcome. So come in, onda, and have a laugh and a letter with us.

WHITEFISH, MONTANA.

EAR UNCLE LISHA:

This is my first attempt to write to the cousins' cor-ner. I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for a ong time and think it is a very good paper indeed. We ave taken it for about fifteen years.

Well, it seems queer not to see any letters or very ew in COMFORT from Montana—and none from the own in which I live.

I am going to ask the cousins if any of them have he song, "The Dying Cowboy." I think it starts out ike this:

"Oh, bury me not on the lone prairie!"

If any of the cousins has it I would like to get it. Will tell you something about myself. I am five feet, ive and a half inches tall. I am sixteen years old, weigh 158 pounds, and am a burnett.

Your niece, MYRTLE LOCKE.

You say you are "a burnett," Myrtle, and I no-tice you are careful not to tell us the color of your hair. It certainly would not take me three guesses to know what shade of hair should be ap-propriate to a "burnett." Nothing but hot stuff would do, and so I'm only taking one try and am guessing you ought to be listed in our immense and constantly growing Red Headed Division. If I'm wrong, let me know, Myrtle, but it seems to me you must be ginger-haired.

That's an orful mournful song you want to know about, Myrtle. Lots of cousins have told me in their letters that there are no more cow-boys—so they must all be dead at the present writing, including, of course, the unfortunate chap you write about. I certainly hope all these dead cowboys were not buried on the "lone prairie" if there is any such legitimate objection to being so interred. Certainly it is a roomy location and the digging should be easy. Not having the rest of the pleasant song, I don't know the particular spot a cowboy would prefer as a resting place, but if they are all dead already, what's the use of arguing about it? We can't all of us be buried where we choose, anyway: I knew a man here in Brooklyn (this was before prohibition) who wanted the worst way to be buried in a brewery, but the unsympathetic Board of Health refused to issue a permit. Finally his relatives compromised by burying him in a forty-gallon barrel out in the northeast corner of a hop field. Myrtle, we can't have everything we want while we are alive—or when we are dead, either. Taking it all in all, I can't see that this cowboy had much to kick about—and lots ought to be cheap on a prairie. Well, perhaps we can find out more about the sad case if some cousin sends in a second verse—or a third and a fourth.

ORLANDO, R. R. 3, OKLAHOMA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I won't say "and Billy, too," as I have always done before, because I know for sure now that he doesn't like me. I don't blame him, for my letters were silly and full of nonsense. In fact they were very much like me. This time, though, it's something very different, folks. I want you to do something for me. I'll tell you all about it:

I've an aunt who is in a hospital for consumption and she thinks she is going to die. You know, "If you believe it, it is so." She is believing it just as hard as she can. Do you think you'd mind sending her a postcard shower? But, for goodness sakes alive, don't tell her I asked you to do it, because then she'd not have anything to think about again in a little while. If she doesn't know where they come from she'll keep wondering about it. See! Wise little cousin, ain't I? Just address your letters to "State Tuberculosis Hospital, Clinton, Oklahoma," but first, of course, you must put her name, "Mrs. Barnaby."

Do you know, folks, things are never as bad as we think they are. I know from experience. Some time ago I was going to write to you and I couldn't find my League card. High and low I hunted for it and was about to cry, when my sister said, "Cry baby!" Then I started out and lectured everybody within hearing distance. I said all the ugly things I could think of. A few days later Mabel was going over the things in her "box," and found my card! I had given it to her to keep for me. I know my number now by heart. I have an awful temper. But I'm going to keep it under lock and key after this.

I wanted to tell you folks how to make a COMFORT Book, but this letter is too long now. Thank Billy for me, Uncle. I won't insult him by speaking to him.

Could a few of you folks manage to write to me?

Your niece, INEZ ROBERTS.

Sure thing, Inez; our Cheer Crowd will get right on the job and give your aunt such a boost of smiles and sympathy that she will think this world is a pretty good place after all and will decide she will soon be well again and able to enjoy life for ten, twenty or thirty years longer. Of course she doesn't have to die and we are not going to let her. You have the right dope, Inez, about how much our health and happiness can be affected by our mental attitude. Concerning health, the best physicians understand this and have learned to bring with them into the sick room a contagion of cheeerful confidence that does much to stimulate recovery. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," is everlastingly true. Our world is largely—or perhaps entirely—a reflex of ourselves. If we look for kindness, we must be kind. If we want truth, we must be true. If we crave friends, we must first be a friend to others. Fear, suspicion, greed, and all like ugly mental attitudes bring back to us their own dark reflections in the mirror of life. There is an affirmative application of the Golden Rule which has a meaning both too little understood or used: All things whatsoever we would that others should do to us, we should do likewise to them. As we give, we are given unto. As we love, so are we loved. This is one of those mysterious spiritual laws whose workings are beyond the tests—and too often, alas, the belief—of science, yet whose strange power is greater and surer than any application of physical law. The first step toward your aunt's recovery, Inez, must be to rule away the thought that she cannot be well again, and I know the letters that our Happy Bunch will send will help just as much as you think they will. To chase Mr. Gloom is the best sort of a job. It is always an open season to hunt the old grouch and the further and faster he is chased the better for everybody and the more room there will be left for smiling.

Inez, that's right to keep your bad temper tightly locked up. It would be good, too, to forget where you put the key and never again let the tiniest bit of the ugly thing get beyond your closely-fastened lips. If you do this you will find yourself and your world so much pleasanter! And you will also surprisingly discover that there are not so many other bad-tempered people around as you once thought.

TILLAR, ARKANSAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Mamma has been taking COMFORT for a long time. I decided I would write to the cousins. I live on a large farm and we have a great many cattle and mules. I have for a pet a little mule. Her name is Tiny. We have a seven months school and I go all I can because I love to go. I am in the sixth grade. My worst study is Physiology.

Now I will describe myself: I have blue eyes, light hair and light complexion. Now guess my age if you can. I am not old enough to court the boys.

Love to you and all the cousins from,

Your niece, HAZEL BOND.

Hazel, if you insist upon being foolhardy enough to have a mule for a pet, I think you are wise to pick out a little one—the Tinier the better. A mule whose right hind leg would be visible only under a microscope would be about the best size, I should say. "Safety first" is the proper motto when it comes to pet mules—and always pet 'em on the nose.

I think it is just as well you are not old enough yet to "court the boys," Hazel. This difficult business would take your mind too much away from that young seven months school you like so well. Instead of studying your physiology and pondering the difference betwixt carpels and metacarpels, you would be riding off every moonlight night to make calls on some lovely blond blue-eyed and blue-jeaned Arkansan. I have heard that Arkansas boys are timid, backward creatures and need a lot of courting, Hazel. So perhaps you will find you have a hard job on your hands when you do start in making calls. Yet this practice you have had in making a pet out of a mule ought to help some. Pick out a little boy just as you have a tiny mule, and you may find it easier at first.

I'm always willing to take a chance, Hazel, and I'm going to guess your age as between twelve and thirteen. You do not offer any prize for the winner, but I'll be satisfied with a picture of you and your pocket edition cotton cultivator.

HASTINGS, MICHIGAN.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I have been a silent reader of your department for ten years and thought I would write.

This is a real nice town. We have a population of about 6,000 here. There are several factories—among them being a large felt boot factory, a large table factory, a bookcase factory, an international lock and seal factory, a gas works and an electric light and power plant.

Well, I will describe myself so you will know how homely I am: I am five feet, two inches tall, weigh 110 pounds, and have light hair and blue eyes. My age is between eighteen and twenty-eight.

Uncle, I wish you had been here for dinner; we had such good apple pie.

I will close, hoping to hear from all the cousins.

Your niece and cousin, LIDA PORTER.

Well, Lida, I was so glad to hear you had such a nice assortment of factories in your town. There is nothing like factories to give a town a cheerful homey look. They have such pretty smoky chimneys and they blow such lovely whistles early in the morning and just in time to make one reach for one's dinner pail. And your factories are such interesting ones! That boot factory, for instance, which will not bother with slim and graceful extremities but makes only "large felt boots." I suppose the smallest size must number ten and from that on to a yard and a half. And then the factory which makes the seals so one can have all the cozy warm sealskin coats one wants. I imagine they make the locks as a side line so a lock can be purchased at the same time to keep the seal coat away from moths and thieves. I really think you are ever so fortunate to have all these factories in your town, Lida. That's one thing I like about Brooklyn—we have plenty of factories. There's a lovely glue factory south of me and a large, handsome soap factory not quite six blocks away. When I open my windows on a spring morning it is delightful to smell the fragrance of these flowers of industry. You should get a soap factory for Hastings if you can. You do not know what you are missing.

Lida, I'll accept any dinner invitation that includes apple pie on the food chart. I like my apple pie flavored with nutmeg, dotted with butter, baked in a square tin—and the corner piece given to me. If nobody watches when the juice runs down my chin I can be completely happy. Why don't you start a large apple pie works in your town, Lida? I think this would be even better than the soap factory. I am open for a job as oven foreman or chief cutter and taster.

PATOKA, LOCK BOX 176, INDIANA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I thought I would write. I was afraid the trains would not run. School started September 11th and I am glad. My brother has got a pup and its mother. Yesterday was my papa's birthday and he was 37 years old. I am going to the fair one day, I guess. My brother and I will go to the new school building. I would like to see all the cousins.

Your niece, THELMA SPORE.

Well, you see, Thelma, the trains did run after all! In fact they ran so fast that they got to Augusta and Brooklyn quite out of breath and laid your letter right on my desk with a big snort. So it was good, you see, that you decided to write to us and give the lazy old trains an excuse for exercise.

I must congratulate your proud papa on his 37th birthday, Thelma. That is a very advanced age, as you know, and he must be a very old and wise parent. I can remember dimly the first time I was 37 years old, Thelma, and how ancient I felt. That was 'way back in 1882, the year of the Great Blizzard. Oh, Geewhillikins! Now I've done it and let out just how old I am. Well, I don't care anyway, I'll have to let it go now, but please don't tell the rest of the cousins; some of 'em think I'm only twenty-six! But I remember, as I was saying, looking at my too shiny dome with a hand mirror on that day back in 1882, and noting as a strange herpicultural phenomenon that I had just thirty-seven hairs left—one for each year of my age. I leave to you to guess how many I have left now after all these long and windswept years have passed across my noble brow.

Thelma, I would like to see all the Family, too, but they would sure take a lot of seeing. Probably if you and I commenced looking at Cousin number one, we would finish up completing an inspection of the Happy Circle somewhere along about 1943. Why, the Red-Headed Division alone would take about two years to look over, Thelma, and we would have to wear smoked glasses all the while we were on this section of our looking job.

CONSTANTIA, NEW YORK.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I have written to you three times before, but oh, dear, I guess Billy the Goat got all the letters I wrote.

I live in New York on a farm of 204 acres. The best of it all is there are three orchards on the farm—nearly all apples. Uncle, won't you and the cousins come and help can some of these apples? Now I don't mean for you to put them all in cans.

Maybe you would like to know who it is that is writing, or at least what she looks like. So here goes: I am five feet, three inches short with brown hair, blue-gray eyes and fair complexion. My age is between thirteen and twenty years, and I weigh 116 pounds.

Cousin Arthur Arnold, I wish that Uncle Lisha and all the cousins could surprise you some night and walk into your home. Then maybe you could forget the one you love who is far away. I have been wondering if you were any relation to my brother's wife. She used to be an Arnold.

Oh, dear, dear! I must close this long letter. Lots of love to all, and some, if not all. Please write to Your niece and cousin, ILA M. HAGEMAN.

Ila, if I owned three apple orchards all at once I would think myself richer than John D. Rockefeller. No more would I have to pour hard-earned wealth into the bottomless pockets of that stony-hearted and piratical corner grocer who smiles and smiles and sells me worm-eaten seconds for twice the price of first quality York State apples. Why, if I owned even one apple orchard, Ila, I could be so happy! I would have it contain some of every variety of the most glorious of fruits, and I would just spend golden October days wandering about under the trees and munching first a Spy, then a McIntosh; here

Thirteen--Twice

What had possessed him to annihilate his and her future happiness? Could he have been attempting robbery to secure money to finance their honeymoon?

Hours and hours they had played together when they were children. Many were the mud pies they had made, and multiplied to the nth degree was the number of Gertrude's dreams that some day she would bake real pies, which he and she alone would have the joy of eating. Never had the one appeared at a picnic or any unusual gathering without the other. Often, in recent months, they had visited a lovely little spot on a sun-kissed hill overlooking Snowflake; a spot where some day they hoped to erect a little bungalow for two. Now that Gertrude was at the point of actually realizing her dreams, misfortune looms up. But crime and crimes would never sever her soul from his. Yet to marry such a man, one whose established reputation for bravery and uprightness was now crumbled, would be a crime itself.

Being a newcomer to the town she knew nothing to do but take a taxi to Central Hotel where Calvin had pre-engaged an apartment for her. He was to call there for her after work hours at the Cox Mercantile Company.

When in her cozy little room over High Street, she sprawled upon the neat bed, buried her face in a pillow and locked her arms nervously around it. Tears and sobs, sobs and tears! Had she only been near her Calvin, whether he were locked in a gloomy cell or struggling in a dirty street from the deadliness of a deserved wound, she would kiss his once-honored brow then seek seclusion where she would die by her own hand. Within her heart she felt that the Creator had destined them for each other.

Abruptly she rose to a sitting posture. Her cheeks were drenched; her hair disheveled. She seized her hat and drew therefrom a keen pin. She was ready to do something, something terrible! She shivered from her own thoughts! Her heart went mad! Her fingers twitched! Her breast heaved violently! On her jugular vein she pressed a trembling finger. The keen pin was coming toward the vein. The profound silence of the room seemed to gasp and say, "Don't, girl! Don't!" But to her, death would be sweet.

"Rap, rap," resounded the door. The sudden noise rasped her wrought-up nerves. She sprang to her feet and involuntarily flung the pin to the floor.

"Come—come in," shrieked she excitedly, not thinking to open the door herself.

A boy stepped in.

"A letter for Miss Cecil, room 13. That you?"

She answered not a word, but frantically seized the letter; scrutinized the envelope, and particularly the handwriting. It was Calvin's. No doubt of it. She started to tear the envelope but stopped. How could she read it? What could it contain but something heartrending? She dropped it to the center-table and set to pacing the floor, scarcely conscious of her actions. But the note had to be read. Mustering all the determination possible, she extracted it from the envelope. It was this:

"MY DEAR GERTRUDE:

"Owing to a misfortune which happened yesterday I cannot come to the hotel for you. Will you please come to my room? I will tell you the rest then. If ever I shall need you it is now. Do come.

CALVIN."

Unconsciously she dropped the letter to the floor, crossed her hands over her breast and gazed upward as if seeking counsel from on high. That moment she resolved to comply with the request of the note. She would visit the criminal, though surreptitiously.

Being in a strange town she was not likely to encounter any acquaintance on the way, nevertheless she dropped a veil over her face. Down through the winding stairway to the street she tripped. Noiselessly she scurried along High toward Graham. The sun had already passed beyond the horizon and the street lights were on. Once on Graham Street she found Number 121 without difficulty. After mounting the flight of steps she rang the doorbell. A charming girl, clad in a brown silk frock answered.

"I'm Miss Cecil," quickly announced the veiled girl.

"Oh, yes. You've come to see Mr. Crist. Go up the stairs there and knock on the first door at the top. His mother will let you in."

"Say, Miss——"

"Roderfield," finished the brown-clad girl.

"Miss Roderfield," went on Miss Cecil, "I want to trust you with a secret."

"Sure," agreed Miss Roderfield.

"It is this: I am a stranger here and I want my coming to see Mr. Crist kept strictly hidden from the public."

"Why kept strictly hidden from the public? What would that matter?" Miss Roderfield reluctantly asked. Then added: "He sent for you, did he not? I am sure he meant nothing that would be misleading.

"During his delirium last night he mumbled your name over and over. To be sure I will do as you wish—if you will tell me——"

"Please do not torture me with such questions," interrupted the troubled girl, ascending the steps.

The building, as she immediately perceived, was a small, cheap-looking hotel. When in front of the designated door she stepped back, mystified, and shuddered fearfully. Upon that door also was a 13; the number her superstitious mind had always detested.

"I'll bet he's dead. I almost know he is," she soliloquized, inaudible to her own ears.

Putting her right ear to the keyhole she listened breathlessly. Not the faintest sound could be heard. She raised a quivering hand; hesitated; then knocked.

The door squeaked and a woman's haggard face was thrust through the opening.

"That you, Miss Cecil?"

"Yes."

"Come right in."

Now there were three in the room; two standing; one lying. The latter was stretched out on a bed over near the window. His head was woefully disfigured with bands of gauze. The door squeaked again and the oldish woman was gone.

"I knew you would come," spoke the wounded man, in an undertone, slightly turning his head toward Gertrude.

Her soft hands fell upon his giant-like ones. Tears gathered in her eyes. She could not force them back. Her head dropped upon his robust breast. An arm gently encircled her shoulders.

"Calvin, Calvin, how could you do such a thing?" she sobbed aloud.

"I couldn't keep from it, dear. But please don't cry. I shall get well. I can't die while there is such a girl as you for me to live for."

"B-b-b-but——Calvin——I——I——can't marry you——after all this."

"Why, dear? I thought you wouldn't care to——marry me while I am so feeble. I have already sent for Parson Brown. He'll be here sometime before nine o'clock."

"If you hadn't——I would be so happy."

"Hadn't what?"

"Tried to—to—to get that money."

"I didn't try. I got it, thank goodness."

A muffled sob.

"I hit him such a blow—with the scale weight that he didn't even reach the street."

"But you—— You got hit with the weight, didn't you, Calvin?"

"No, no, I threw it and was shot by that sneaking, fiendish burglar while recovering the money from him. Calvin Redman, he told the public was his name. He had been loafing around town for two or three weeks and no one even suspicioned him to be the sought-for, mysterious burglar until yesterday. Some say he was keeping company regularly with one of the soda-fountain girls of Long's Drug Store."

"My hero, my hero, in spite of two thirteens," she cried with ecstasy.

"Two odds make an even every time, my girl," he smiled. "Listen! Someone is knocking. It's Parson Brown—, I know."

But parson had to wait outside—till they put the climax on.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

expose them. For the sake of my children I agreed I would say nothing. My husband is as good to me as can be but I find that my love for him is more like a mother's for an erring child. There are times when I can hardly endure his presence. I believe that if I can hold out to help him, he will still make good but sometimes it seems an impossible task. The girl's mother has noticed the coolness between us and, motherlike, feels that I am in the wrong. I do not blame her but it is an insult to me and I do not feel that I did anything but right. I wanted to conceal the disgrace so have not discussed it with anyone. I would like the sisters' ideas as to whether I did the right thing or not. My husband says that I am the best woman in the world and that he loves only me, but that is small comfort now. We all live near each other and meet many times a day. Husband wanted to move but I said, no, if he couldn't treat me right here he wouldn't anywhere else.

MARY JANE.

Mary Jane requests me not to forward letters to her so don't write to her, personally, only through COMFORT.—Ed.

ST. LOUIS, 8630 CHURCH ROAD, MO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Please let me enter your happy circle. I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years and think it the best magazine published and have learned many things from it.

Let me tell you how I made my old wornout linoleum look and wear like new. First I gave it two coats of white paint, then I took a sponge and sponged it with blue, after this I varnished it with oilcloth varnish. It looks like a new granite linoleum and does not show the dirt.

To cover heavy scratches on your furniture, take varnish of the same color as your furniture and rub it on the scratches with a cloth, then rub dry immediately. It will cover the scratches and will not ruin the other varnish.

I am five feet, two inches tall, have brown hair and eyes, fair complexion, weigh about 104 pounds, and twenty-six years old. Have been married five and one-half years, have a good husband and two little boys. I think married life is what people make it.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters,

MRS. ERNEST ROSENKOETTER.

Mrs. R.—You don't mind if I call you that, do you? I wanted to keep your letter until the March issue—the household number, but if used now it may be the means of recalling to the minds of the sisters something they did last spring that made housecleaning easier and saved money, and if they write very soon their letters will have a better chance of appearing in that issue.—Ed.

KAMPSVILLE, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I believe I promised Mrs. W. that I wouldn't bother her any more but after reading Mrs. A. M. Urness's letter, I couldn't resist the temptation of writing.

When I read her letter my blood just boiled. Instead of saying, "if every girl that has a child without a name to give it, was made to serve a sentence in the 'pen'" she should have said, "every man who does not give his child a name by marrying the mother and supporting her and the child should be shot," there would be less illegitimate children in this world.

The fact that the woman has the law on her side doesn't alter things a bit. We don't have any law unless you want to call money "law." The one who has the most money rules. The law can make a man marry a girl but it can't make him marry her and treat her right. I know of one case where a sixteen-year-old girl made a man marry her, who had promised to. They were married five months when the first baby came. The girl was not allowed to be seen with her husband, though he went everywhere. He was cruel to her, killed her by inches, whipped her and aggravated the life out of her. His own folks upheld and kept things quiet for him. They were unkind to her, too. She was a motherless child. She had been dead only a short time when he had to marry another girl and treated her the same way. Men like this should be sent to the "pen" instead of sending the girl there.

MRS. IDA BECKER.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS: OHIO.

I have often wanted to write but never could get started but after reading Mrs. Urness's letter I couldn't help but write.

Dear lady, you little realize how unjust you are to those girls or how much they need sympathy. Are their children any different from other children? Do you enjoy the bitter pangs you are causing those girls, by condemning them so harshly? Do you know that a girl pays with her heart's blood for that very sin? I know, Mrs. Urness, for I paid. I was barely seventeen when my baby was born. The humiliation and mental suffering a girl goes through is enough to turn her mind. I never meant to be bad but how many girls there are who are not strong enough to fight herself and the man she loves. Only once I stepped from the straight and narrow path but that told. He never cared for me after that though before he did not want me out of his sight and called me endearing names and often spoke of the time when I would be his wife. After he won he became cooler toward me and finally drifted away. When I discovered my condition he pretended to be sorry and told me not to worry for he would marry me the next day. I did not ask him to live with me or even support me, only give me his name and protection for baby. His mother cried and pleaded with him not to leave her and his sister was shocked over the idea of her brother being married only a few months when his baby was born. They won for he came back and told me he did not love me and would not marry me and that he did not think it was his child anyway. Only experience knows what a girl suffers when the person she loves best talks like that. I had a good reputation and was from a good family so they had nothing against me previous to that. Yes, the law is on a girl's side to a certain extent. If the man won't marry you and you don't want his money, you are done. What do you want the man she loves and her child's father in Jail, even for three months? She does not revenge, only justice. We both live in the same town and never notice each other. That happened two years ago. If he ever sees my child now he cannot help but know paternity for the boy is the image of him. Only those in my position knows the bitter suffering of a deserted wedded mother. When I would see my sister and husband fondling their children, how my heart ached, and when my own child asked why he had no father, I felt the most deserted creature on earth. Sometimes I feel forsaken by God and would cease praying but always went back and He surely helped me in my hour of sorrow. Our little Ohio town is not so critical as some town, Mrs. Urness, for I've never had any insults cast at me. Men seem to respect me and could have married well before I did. People here do not seem to think a girl all bad because she does wrong once. I am married now to a man of good people and good positions and they do not look down beneath them and I have my child with me. My husband is good to us and we have another boy who is his father's idol. I do not feel at ease when I am out in public. Because I have a good husband does not mean that I am through for I must go on regretting as long as I live. I am writing this to incite sympathy but to show that she is too severe on those who have gone and to let other girls know they have friends.

Worried Mother, do you ever think of the future of the little mother-to-be? Write and tell her boy married her and saved her from eternal God will surely bless him if he does for He cares for innocent little children to suffer and the must for the sins of their parents.

OTTA [illegible]

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years never had courage to write. I have always any letter I might write would not be there are so many more interesting ones would be.

I would like to know what Mrs. A. M. Urness do with the man who caused the baby to be out a name, while the poor girl who went the suffering and disgrace was in the "pen." to me the girls are condemned forever and treated as though they had done nothing long as men are treated this way there will women. Remember, dear sisters, if there men there would be no bad women.

If the parents would talk to their girls about life and its mysteries there would be fortunates along this line. I have three baby girl and my boys, twelve, nine and everything about their bodies that I can tell have taught them to treat other girls as they want their sister treated. Now when other them things they come to see me and we always ver and if they have the wrong information the truth. I believe when children ask should be answered truthfully. You can make of life so interesting and beautiful that be glad to hear it and it will also help you child's confidence. Make a companion of girl. —send the socks to us in Buffalo—

You need have no previous experience in order to learn to successfully operate the Auto Knitter. Its operation is fully explained by the instruction book which comes with every machine, and if you are willing to apply yourself to the work—and to follow the instructions given, then there is no reason why you should not be successful with Auto Knitting as a spare-time money-making occupation.

A Wonderful Work Record Less Than 5% Rejections

The Auto Knitter is for workers—for those who are serious in their desire to make money in their spare hours. The Olde Tyme Wool Socks that are sent to us under the Work Contract come from everywhere—from new workers, who are just beginning their work and from old friends of long standing. Here are socks from novices as well as the experienced, socks from careless as well as painstaking—

And yet, out of the huge total sent in to us, less than 5% have to be laid aside and returned to the worker as not being up to the standard set for Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks.

We believe it to be a great tribute to the general all-around efficiency of the Auto Knitter and the Auto Knitter worker, that the rejections on this home work, performed in thousands of different homes, are so small as to be almost negligible. If these folks learned from the instruction book to make socks that average less than 5% rejections, can you not do so, too?

Your earnings will be in proportion to the time you devote to the work and the degree of proficiency attained through practice.

How You Can Make Money at Home

Clearly and briefly, here is our proposition: The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company enters into a five year agreement to pay for all of the standard socks you knit on the Auto Knitter and send in to them, paying a fixed guaranteed price. Knitted Articles and Two Quil

Child's Coat and Cap

Three to Four Years Size

MATERIALS: Scotch heather mixture in blue or brown, three hanks for coat, one for cap, one pair knitting needles, No. 6, and one pair No. 3. Six medium-size pearl buttons.

This little coat is made in one piece, in plain garter stitch.

The cuffs are knitted on to the ends of the sleeves and turned back, the collar is made in a straight piece and sewed in place.

Do not slip the first stitch in rows.

Directions for the Coat

Begin at lower edge of back by casting on 106 stitches.

Knit back and forth for 50 rows.

51st row—Decrease at beginning of row by knitting 2 sts together. Knit to within 2 sts at end of rows. Knit these two together. Upon these 104 sts knit 12 more rows.

KNITTED COAT AND CAP.

65th row—Same Same as 51st row. Knit 13 more rows on 102 sts.

79th row—Same as 51st row. Knit 13 more rows on 100 sts.

93rd row—* Same as 51st row. Knit 11 more rows on 98 sts. *.

Now repeat from * to * four times more; this will reduce the stitches from 90 and make 152 rows from beginning.

The work at this point should measure about 14 to 15 inches. Now cast on for sleeves as follows: Cast on 40 stitches at end of last row, turn, knit across and cast on 40 stitches for the second sleeve.

154th row—There should now be 170 sts of needle—90 on body and 80 for the sleeves. Knit 48 rows, or until sleeves measure four and one-half inches in width.

203rd row—Knit 70 sts, run these on an extra needle; cast or bind off 30 sts for back of neck knit along remaining sts to end of row.

The back portion is now finished.

Continue work for left half of front on 70 stitches, shaping the neck as follows:

1st row of Front—K 70 sts, cast on 2 sts.
2nd row—K 72 sts.
3rd row—K 72 sts, cast on 2 sts, turn.
4th row—K 74 sts.
5th row—K 74 sts, cast on 2 sts, turn.
6th row—K 76 sts.
7th row—K 76 sts, cast on 4 sts, turn.
8th row—K 80 sts.
9th row—K 80 sts, cast on 5 sts, turn.
10th row—K 85 sts.

Knit upon these 85 sts for 38 rows.

48th row—At the sleeve end cast off 40 sts, knit along remaining 45 sts to end of the row.

Knit 11 rows on 45 sts without increasing. Then on under arm or sleeve edge increase as follows:

61st row—K 2 into first stitch by knitting both front and back of stitch, thus increasing one stitch. K to end of row (46 sts). K upon these 46 sts for 11 rows without increasing.

73rd row—K 2 into first stitch as before, k to end of row (47 sts), k 11 rows without increasing.

85th row—K 2 into first stitch, k to end of row (48 sts), k 11 rows without increasing.

97th row—Increase 1 st as before, k to end of row (49 sts), k 11 rows without increasing.

109th row—Increase (50 sts), k 13 rows without increasing.

123rd row—Increase (51 sts), k 13 rows without increasing.

137th row—Increase (52 sts), k 13 rows without increasing.

151st row—Increase (53 sts), k upon these 53 sts for 51 more rows, making 201 rows from commencement of front. Bind off easily so as not to draw in the bottom of the coat.

Right Front

Now join the wool in at the neck end and work on the 70 stitches left for this front. Knit across.

2nd row—Knit back to neck, cast on 2 sts. Increase on neck end of work as directed for first side, until one has 85 stitches on the needles. Knit upon these 85 stitches for 38 rows, finishing at sleeve end.

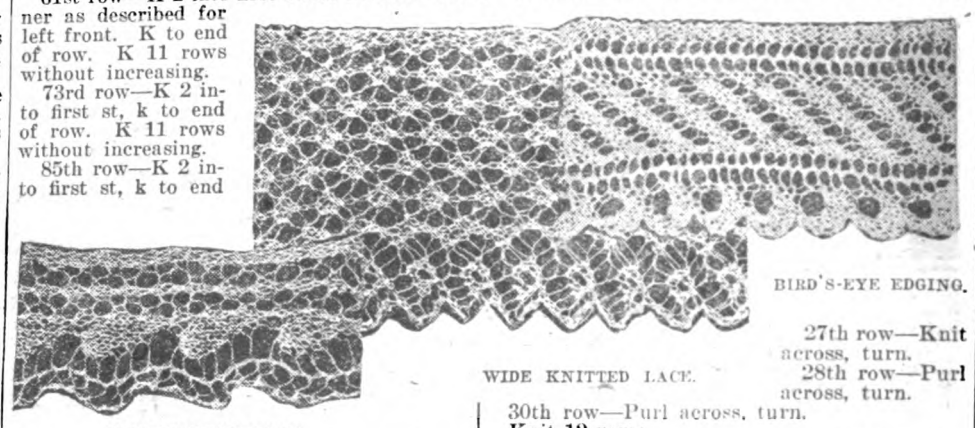
48th row—Cast off first 40 sts for sleeve. Knit along remaining stitches to end of the row (45 sts). Knit upon these 45 sts for 11 rows without increasing.

61st row—K 2 into first stitch in same manner as described for left front. K to end of row. K 11 rows without increasing.

73rd row—K 2 into first st, k to end of row. K 11 rows without increasing.

85th row—K 2 into first st, k to end of row. K 11 rows without increasing.

97th row—K 2 into first st, k to end of row. K 11 rows without increasing.



109th row—K 2 into first st, k to end of row. K 13 rows without increasing.

123rd row—K 2 into first st, k to end of row. K 13 rows without increasing.

151st row—K 2 into first st, k to end of row.

Knit upon the 53 stitches now on the needle for 51 rows without increasing, thus completing the right front and making 201 rows in all. Bind off easily.

BIRD'S-EYE EDGING.

FINE KNITTED LACE.

WIDE KNITTED LACE.

Cuffs

On a No. 3 needle or one two sizes smaller. Pick up 48 stitches (1st for each ridge) on end of sleeve, knit first two stitches together, knit across, knit last two stitches together, reducing number to 46 stitches.

Knit upon these stitches until cuff measures about four and one-half inches. Bind off. Make cuff on opposite sleeve to match.

Collar

Cast on 50 stitches and knit back and forth until work measures about four and one-half or five inches in width. Bind off and sew in place, making seam on neck on the right side which will be hidden when the collar rolls back.

Join up side seams of garment and sleeves to the cuffs on the wrong side.

Join cuffs on the opposite side so that seam will be covered when rolled back.

Press seams lightly under a damp cloth with a fairly hot iron.

Fold right front into four equal parts, mark the edge with pins. Join wool into edge below bottom pin, make an inch and a half chain. Join an inch and a half above with one slip stitch into the edge, turn, cover the chain with single crochet, leaving end of wool long enough to be threaded so it can be finished off with a needle.

Make three more loops for buttons.

Sew buttons on the opposite side about an inch and a half in from the edge, and sewing through a small button or a piece of tape on the wrong side placed under each button to strengthen and prevent their pulling out.

Belt

Cast on 8 sts, k 8 rows, turn, k 4 sts, turn. K 8 rows on 4 sts. Slip stitches on a safety-pin. K 8 rows on the other 4 sts, slip all stitches on one needle and knit until belt is the right length, make a second buttonhole, k 8 rows and bind off. Sew two buttons in place the same distance from each end. Catch the belt in place invisible by using the same wool at the side seams.

Cap

This is of plain knitting worked on the No. 6 needles. Cast on 80 to 85 sts, as work should measure 14 to 16 inches, according to the size of the child's head.

The width without the turn up should be 10 to 11 inches with a three-inch band to turn up. The cap is joined up, top gathered and finished with a thick tassel.

Knit 13 ribs (26 rows) without decreasing.

27th row—Knit across, turn.

28th row—Purl across, turn.

30th row—Purl across, turn.

Knit 12 rows.

43rd row—K 6, k 2 together, k to within eight of the opposite end, k 2 together, k 6.

Knit eight rows without decreasing.

51st row—Same as 43rd row.

Knit four rows.

56th row—Knit first, last and two center stitches together.

Knit four rows.

61st row—Knit first and last two stitches together.

Knit four rows.

Now count the stitches and continue to knit as follows until work measures 10 or more inches from purling:

Always knit first two and center two stitches together in every other row, knitting row between without decrease.

When length of cap is completed, break off wool, leaving an end about one yard long. Thread this into a large needle and run through the stitch remaining on knitting needle. Draw out knitting needle, draw up stitches closely and sew together. Join sides of cap together to within an inch of the purling.

Run needle through, reverse the cap and finish the balance of the seam up on the right side. Roll the band back at the purling. Make a short, thick tassel thus: Wind the wool thickly about your four fingers, slip off and tie the strands securely, cut opposite side of strands. Draw all together firmly through the hand, holding the tying between the thumb and forefinger, and tie around firmly about one-half inch down from the middle. Trim the ends off, shake out and sew in place to the top of the cap.

GIRL'S SWEATER AND SKIRT.

Girl's Sweater and Ribbed Wool Skirt

Size 10 to 12 Years

Materials: Ten-ounce grey Scotch or four-ply Germantown, and four ounces of the same wool in scarlet; one pair No. 6 amber needles.

The skirt is worked up and down of the two colors, alternating. The number of stitches necessary varies with the length of the skirt one desires.

To get the approximate number, cast on 15 stitches, knit back and forth for eight or 10 ribs, then measure the number of stitches one has to the inch. If five or six, multiply this by the number of inches the finished skirt is to be; for example, a 15-inch skirt length, made with needles giving five stitches to the inch gives one a total of 75 stitches.

It is well, however, to discount at least five stitches to allow for the natural stretching of a knitted garment.

Having secured the proper number of stitches, cast on, using the scarlet wool.

1st row—Knit across, turn.
2nd row—Purl across, turn.

Repeat these two rows six times more.

15th row—Join in grey wool, knit across, turn.

16th row—Knit across, turn.

* Knit 15 ridges (26 rows).

Join in scarlet wool.

Knit one row, purl one row, repeat, ending with 14th row of scarlet purled. Join in grey wool, knit across, turn. Now repeat from * until the skirt is the right width.

Finish with a grey strip, and join with needle and thread to the first strip of scarlet.

To finish Top of Skirt.—Fold two grey stripes over scarlet to meet in a box plait, with grey wool pick up one stitch for each rib, working through all thicknesses. Knit a ribbed band an inch and a half wide of k 3 sts, p 3 sts, repeat.

Slip-on Sweater

By following suggestions given, a garment of the proper size can easily be made.

The work is begun as usual at the bottom of the back of the sweater. To find just the number of stitches needed, measure across the back from armpit to armpit, multiply number of stitches to the inch by number of inches indicated; say 15 inches by five stitches to the inch, totaling 75, less five stitches for stretching, makes about 70 stitches to cast on for a 10-year size.

Starting with scarlet wool knit [illegible] (18 rows). Join in grey wool and [illegible] and forth, always slipping first [illegible] work measures 12 to 14 inches, [illegible] length of garment desired.

Cast on for sleeves. The accurate [illegible] of stitches needed for these can easily [illegible] tained by holding the edge of the [illegible] back of the sweater to the armpit, and [illegible] uring down the back of the arm to the [illegible]

Count and cast on the number of [illegible] indicated.

Knit across to opposite side and cast [illegible] same number of stitches for the second [illegible]

Knit 25 ribs (or about five and [illegible] inches). Count stitches, and mark [illegible] placing pins either side of the 50 stitches [illegible] the center of the back. From the wrong [illegible] sleeve, turn, and knit to the first pin. Slip these stitches onto an extra needle. Bind off stitches for the neck, knit to end of row, turn.

Knit 25 ribs, increasing at the neck end by casting on one stitch every other ridge until 15 stitches have been added.

When 25 ridges are completed bind off same number of stitches cast on for sleeves.

Now increase by adding one stitch to every other ridge on under-arm end of work until five stitches have been added. Slip stitches on extra needle. Complete other sleeve and side to this point in the same way.

Slip all stitches onto one needle, and see that each of the last rows have been worked in the same direction.

Knit until grey work equals length of the back of the garment, then join in scarlet, knit nine edges and [illegible] easily.

WOOL DAISY DRESS

Cuffs

Pick up one stitch for each ridge [illegible] nine ridges in grey, five in scarlet [illegible] easily.

The neck is finished with a band [illegible] which is made separately. For this [illegible] 11 stitches, knit back and forth, always [illegible] ping the first stitch until bind is long [illegible] to finish edge of neck.

This should be pinned in place [illegible] garment is on the wearer if possible [illegible] avoid any drawing. Fold the band [illegible] and slip over edge of back of the neck [illegible] ning at the left-hand side, carry around [illegible] the front and up to this point again, [illegible] can be neatly joined.

Stitch band in place with needle [illegible] with the same wool. Tie at the neck [illegible] scarlet cord and small tassels.

Wool Daisy Dress

Five Year Size

To make this charming little [illegible] one will need five balls light blue [illegible] floss, one ball old blue, one skein each of [illegible] and yellow rope embroidery silk, one [illegible] No. 5 amber needles, one dull-pointed [illegible] needle and a No. 2 steel crochet hook.

The work is begun at lower edge of [illegible] of the skirt.

Knit a sample, and if one has five [illegible] to the inch with the wool and needles [illegible] cast on 120 stitches. For smaller [illegible] omit 10 stitches for each year less, for [illegible] ones add 10 stitches for each year.

Cast on with the old or darker [illegible] knit plain for three inches. Break [illegible] in light blue. Knit until work measures [illegible] es or length needed for skirt from [illegible]

For waist-line knit 2 sts together [illegible] row, thus reducing the sts just one-half.

Knit three inches (for other sizes [illegible] amount), then cast on 5 sts at the end [illegible] row until 25 sts have been added to each [illegible] (Add more or less as needed for other [illegible]

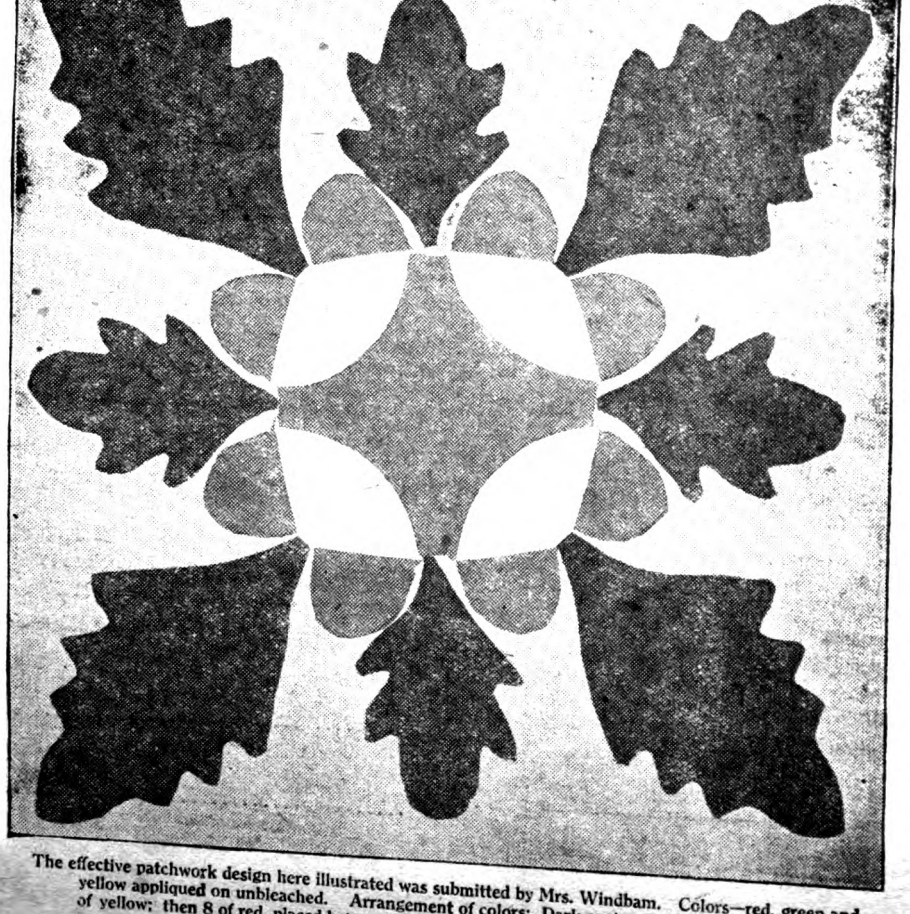
Work on remaining sts until length [illegible] as front between arm size and waist [illegible]

Skirt

Knit from and back of each st[illegible] doubling the number of stitches. Knit [illegible] three and one-half inches. Slip stitches [illegible] extra needle. Pick up stitches for other [illegible] and complete to this point according [illegible] rections given.

Then slip all stitches onto one needle [illegible] work until back is as long as front from [illegible] line to the border. Join in old blue [illegible] border, binding off loosely.



Embroider daisies with the white silk [illegible] the neck, using one-half inch lazy-daisy [illegible] for the petals and filling the center [illegible] with the yellow silk in French knots.

Make four or more wool crocheted [illegible] for closing the back. With crochet hook [illegible] light blue wool ch 3, join, fill with sts [illegible] chet. Work round and round, under both [illegible] of each stitch, increasing as is necessary [illegible] working 2 s c in a st.

When size of a cent, slip over a small [illegible] ton, thread end of wool into blunt-point [illegible] needle and sew over and over, before sewing [illegible] in place on right side of back of the work.

On the opposite edge mark spaces with [illegible] join wool into edge at second pin from end, [illegible] ch 4 or 5, join at first pin, turn, s c over [illegible] s c into edge to next second pin, ch, turn, [illegible] s c over ch and repeat for number of loops [illegible] needed.

The neck and edge of the sleeves may be [illegible] finished with one row of crocheting of either [illegible] wool or white silk if desired.

The effective patchwork design here illustrated was submitted by Mrs. Windbam. Colors—red, green and yellow appliqued on unbleached. Arrangement of colors: Dark center red surrounded by 4 pieces of yellow; then 8 of red, placed between the 8 leaves of green.

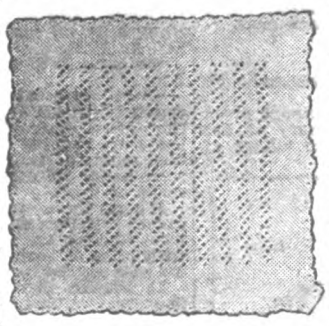
PEEK-A-BOO.

Insertion to match can be made by simply omitting the edge or making both sides alike.

Man's Motor Gloves



One skein each of two shades of grey Scotch and two pairs of No. 12 steel needles will be required.

With darker shade cast 20 stitches on each of three needles, knit in ribs of 2 and 2 for 45 rounds.

At end of last round increase 1, for now both shades will be used and an uneven number of stitches required.

1st round of hand—K 2 sts of each shade, alternating, until 5 sts remain. These begin thumb. Work them with dark grey and purl 1, k 1, p 1.
2nd round—Same as last.
3rd round—The same, but alternate the shades, bringing light over dark and vice versa, checker-board style, thumb stitches same shade as before.
4th round—Same as 3rd rd.

The block pattern is continued in this way throughout the hand, the colors reversed after every second round, though no mention will be made of it hereafter. The color not in use always hangs inside the work to be taken up as needed, and the only care necessary is to see that the threads are not pulled up too tightly as one changes from one shade to another.

OPENWORK STRIP.

The thumb is increased as follows:

5th round—K 2 in first thumb st, k 3, k 2 in last thumb stitch.

Increase in this way in every 5th rd, until there are 13 sst between the increasing, or 71 sts in all on the needles.

K 10 rounds without increasing. Run 15 thumb sts onto a thread.

Care should be taken when carrying the contrasting color back of he thumb to leave it very loose, so that there will be sufficient room to fasten off these threads securely.

Upon the 56 sts now remaining on the needles work 1 rd and at the end of it cast on 8 sts right next to the thumb.

Work 14 rds. plain, still using block pattern.

Then knit 1 rd of the dark grey and on this rd on the outside, opposite the thumb, narrow twice. There should now be 62 sts on needles. For the first finger k 9, run all the stitches of the hand, excepting the last seven, onto a thread, cast 4 sts on a needle next to the 9 sts just omitted, k 7 sts. Work for 28 rds, then decrease as follows:

1st round—K 2, k 2 together, repeat all around.
Knit 3 rds without decreasing.
5th round—K 2, k 2 together, repeat all around.
6th round—Same as 5th rd.
7th round—Knit without decreasing.
8th round—K 1, k 2 together, repeat around.

Draw remaining stitches together and fasten off on wrong side.

For the second finger, take next 7 sts from inside of the hand, cast 3 sts onto another needle, take the last 8 sts from the thread and pick up the 4 sts that were cast on for the first finger, 22 sts in all.

1st round—Knit plain to the 4 sts that were picked up, on them narrow twice, giving 20 sts in all on needles.

K 33 rds. Decrease now as directed for the first finger.

For the third finger take 7 sts from the inside of the hand, cast on 2 sts, take the next 8 sts from the thread, pick up 5 sts on the second finger, and knit 1 round plain, narrowing on the picked-up sts as in last finger. On 20 sts now on needles knit 30 rds and decrease as before.

For the fourth finger, take the remaining 16 sts and pick up 4 sts on the third finger. Knit 1st rd, narrow twice on the 4 sts, leaving 18 sts on the needles.

Knit 21 rds, then decrease.

For the thumb, take up the 15 sts from the thread, pick up 10 sts on those cast on for the hand, and knit 3 rds, narrowing at the beginning and end of the 10 sts that were picked up until there remain 20 sts on needles.

Knit 18 rds and decrease as for the fingers, except that four plain rounds are knitted after the first, decreasing, instead of three as in the fingers.

In making the second glove care must be taken to have the thumb at the opposite side of the hand. This is done by taking the first five thumb stitches at the beginning instead of at the end of the round.

Any combination of colors to suit individual taste may be used, but quite dark shades are preferable, such as greys, browns, or grey and blue or brown.

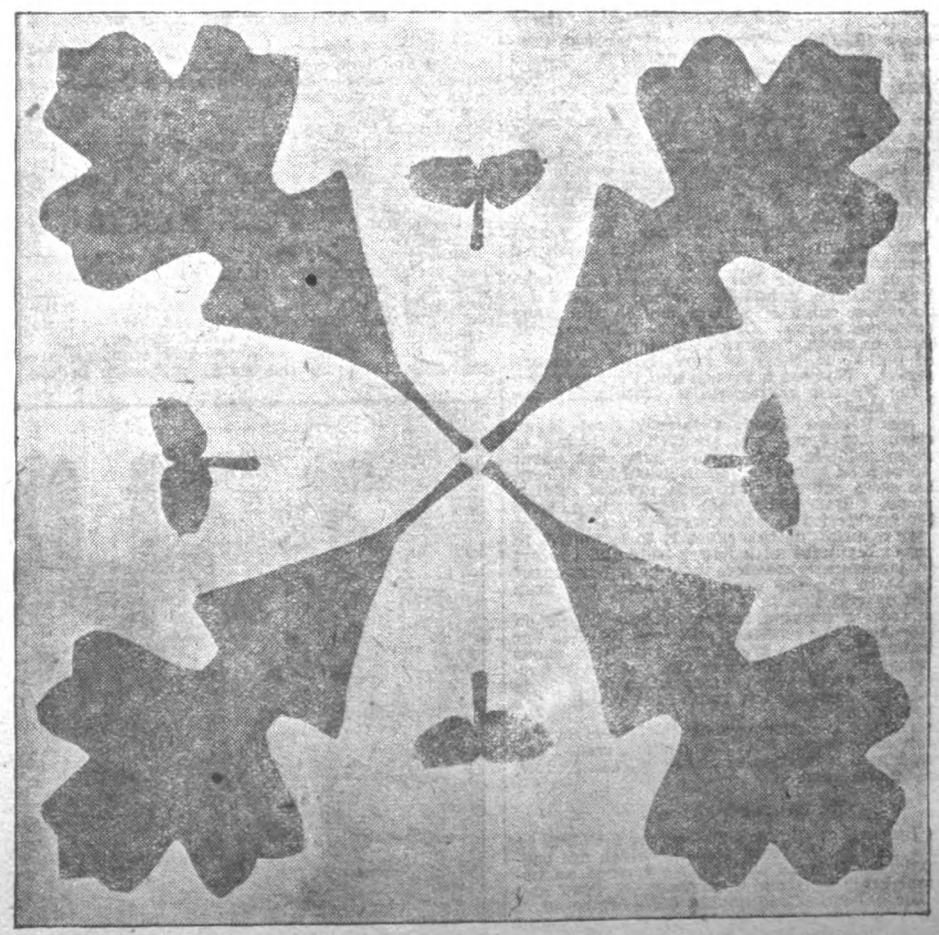
This is a narrow open-work edging Cast on 10 stitches.



1st row—K 3, o, n, o twice, n, o twice, n, k 1.
2nd row—Throw the thread in front of the needle to make a stitch, then k 3, p 1, k 2, p 1, k 2, o, n, k 1.
3rd row—K 3, o, n, k 8.
4th row—Bind off 3 sts, k 6, o, n, k 1, repeat from the 1st row.

For Safety Pins

One large ivory ring, five smaller ones size of a cent, one yard baby ribbon. Tie this to large ring, thread through large one, through small one, back through large one, through second small one and so on. After all are threaded tie end to large ring. Hang up by large ring, now pull center small ring down lower than others, those on either side of it a ring size shorter, and the first and fifth the same distance shorter. Tie ribbons just above the small rings and below the large one with a silk thread so they will remain in this position.

MOTOR GLOVES.

Another arrangement combining oak leaves and acorns. This clever design which we understand is original, was submitted by Mrs. Brent. Background unbleached, leaves dark green; acorns tan, caps covered closely with brown French knots. The stems are of brown in solid satin stitch.

Cause of French Bitterness toward Germany Seen in War-Ruined Region

REGRETFULLY bidding adieu to the hospitable Swiss and their wonderful land of awe-inspiring beauty I departed on my return journey by airplane. I stopped off at Paris and during my stay at the French capital made an excursion to the battlefields of France where I spent two busy days in visiting the principal places of interest and observing the evidences of the merciless destruction wrought by the Germans.

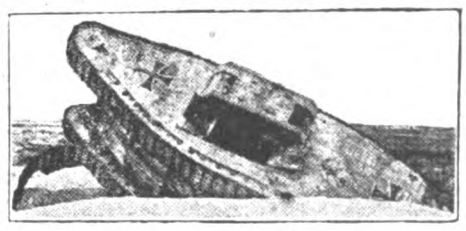
The tourist companies have so systematized this trip that one can cover a vast amount of the battlefield area in two days. Great motor coaches start out from Paris, each accompanied by a guide, and in two days' time, and at an expense of less than $25, including all hotel and other accommodations, one sees the more important towns and cities that were the scene of the awful carnage.

This battlefield service is being used by thousands of tourists. Visitors from England and America are getting a more intimate knowledge of the localities through which their armies fought. Perhaps most every visitor has one or more relatives or friends sleeping his last sleep somewhere in this devastated area.

It is not a trip of pleasure, for the realities of war are brought home too vividly. But it is a trip that gives one a better understanding of what our boys passed through. It also gives one a better understanding of some of the points of view of the French nation at the present time. With the memory of the hundreds of thousands who lost their lives at the hands of the German army, and with the hundreds of square miles of devastated country, there is great cause for the bitterness that still exists in the hearts of the French people.

The French Viewpoint

The French government has gone ahead and expended huge sums in reconstruction work in the devastated area, having borrowed the money therefor in expectation of being reimbursed from the war indemnity that Germany was to pay in accordance with the terms of the peace treaty following the World War. For the short war of 1870-71, although it was fought on French soil, the victorious Germans exacted from France a heavy money indemnity besides taking two of her richest provinces, and France paid promptly and in full. Now, however, Germany is not paying the installments due and overdue to France and claims she cannot raise the requisite cash. But the French assert that Germany's default is due to disinclination rather than inability to pay.



For a description of the scenes and objects that most impressed me on this tour of the battlefields I give the following extracts from my diary written as we went along which give an idea of how comprehensive the trip was, although I could note down but a small portion of what I saw.

AMERICAN CEMETERY IN BELLEAU WOODS, CHATEAU THIERRY.

As we continue our journey after lunch, a few miles away over on a side-hill are the gas-killed woods. The sight of all the dead and broken-limbed trees gives one a very vivid idea of how very deadly the fumes of the gas used by the Germans were, for when the woods were simply shelled they came to life and leaves came out again, but the gassed trees are dead and gone forever.

We pass a large Italian cemetery where 4,000 were killed on one hill and buried on the spot.

GERMAN TANK CAPTURED IN BATTLE IN FRANCE.

A stone wall encloses and a large Italian flag is flying, as they did not let the Germans pass.

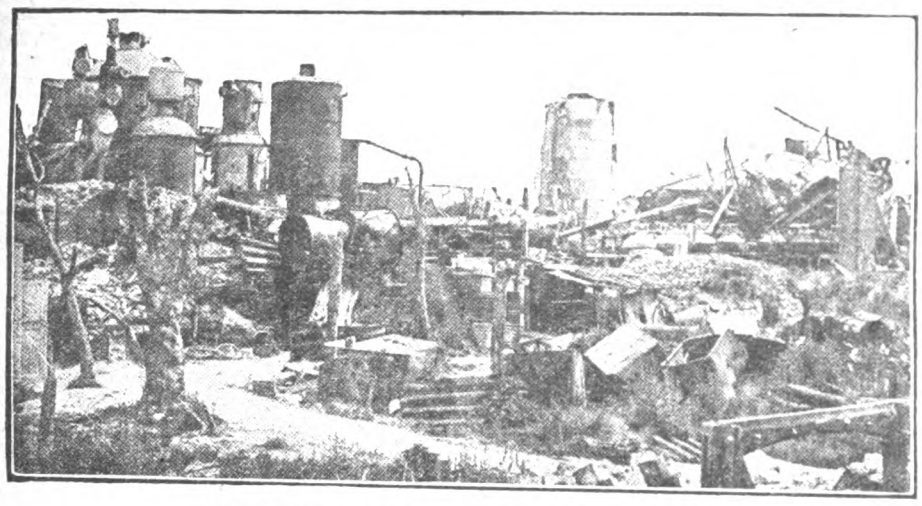
The Roosevelt Grave

The Roosevelt grave is something over an hour's bus ride from Chateau Thierry.

A beautiful large cement watering trough given by Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt in memory of her son Quentin has been erected in the village of Chamery near where he fell. It is a ten minutes' walk out to the field where he was shot down. There is a marker on the spot, and his cement-covered grave, enclosed with a white fence covered with wreaths of artificial flowers, is about 25 feet away.

Quite a lot of barbed wire is strewn around here and the farmers are peacefully harvesting their grain.

We changed tires during our stop and the geese gaggled and hens cackled instead of German shells whistling over our heads or dropping through the roofs of red-tiled houses.



As we approach Rheims we see a lot of old barbed wire piled up along the road, but the vineyards are all looking green and thrifty as we ride through this beautiful Champagne valley. In the distance stand majestically the twin towers of the Rheims Cathedral that withstood so nobly the thousands and thousands of German shells that were daily rained upon them during the four years of the war.

The vineyards of the Champagne valley have been pretty much restored, so wine is very cheap. In fact, I was obliged to pay two and one-half francs for a bottle of water while others of the party got good wine for two francs. Water is an expensive luxury in this part of the country.

The walls of the buildings left standing are gradually assuming the shape of houses in the work of restoration that goes slowly but thoroughly on. The beautiful old city hall is nearly ruined but they are trying in some way to hold the elegant front of the building together and the Cathedral itself is being first strengthened from the inside, and eventually will be put in shape to hold services.

A statue of one of the French kings stands near by unharmed as does the Joan of Arc statue. There are hundreds of large stone buildings that are mostly destroyed that are being cleared and slowly undergoing reconstruction. They seem to try and rebuild as near the old form as possible.

The wooden shed-like buildings erected in the parks are still being used for families who cannot get better quarters to live in.

RUINS OF SUGAR REFINERY AT BERRY-AU-BAC.

Tour of the Great Battlefields As Noted in My Diary

August 18, 1922.—There were fourteen passengers of us on Cook's auto bus as we passed Joffre's Headquarters in the first drive on Paris of 1914, fifteen miles out from Paris. On the Marne, in the town of Meaux, 26 miles out, we visited a large cathedral where an anniversary service is held on Sept. 10 each year for the Victory of the Marne. The big Generals—Joffre, Foch, etc., all come here to commemorate the victory. The battle was fought a few miles away from this cathedral. We passed over bridges that were blown up in the late war (some of them three times during the past 100 years) and now rebuilt, and another bridge destroyed by Germans in their retreat in 1914.

Lucy le Boege, our first stop, shows ruins near Chateau Thierry, a boulder erected in 1918 for 2nd Division, ruins of a large church and many roofless stone houses. Others have been restored.

Sign here reads, "American Cemetery Belleau." Found bullets in the road here, lying in among the gravel. We pass a French and German cemetery, the French having white crosses, and the Germans black.

At the Belleau Woods Cemetery there is an American flag flying and about 2,900 bodies of American soldiers were buried here, but about half have been removed. Each grave has a large wooden cross painted white with name of soldier, if known. But bodies are being taken from smaller cemeteries in other sections and brought here for reburial, as this place is to be walled in and made beautiful with flower beds and the art of the landscape gardener, making a permanent resting-place for the dead that have not been claimed by relatives in America.

The trees remaining in the Belleau Woods on the hill above the cemetery still look limbless but are leafing out quite green, and the fields about here are filled with golden grain just being harvested. We are nearly seventy miles from Paris now at 12.30, having left Paris at 9 o'clock. We lunch at 1 o'clock.

There is a register here at the Cemetery for all visitors to sign. Miss Longfellow, from Cambridge, Mass., a relative of Henry W. Longfellow, is among the number.

At Chateau Thierry

We lunched at Chateau Thierry at 1 o'clock at a little old inn, the front steps of which are badly broken by German shells. We crossed an improvised bridge getting here, made of wood and iron, the old stone one having been destroyed.

The buildings here are partly destroyed and partly repaired and rebuilt, new red-tiled roofs being put on to many of those partly destroyed. All houses are built of small stone, cement covered.

August 19th

First place after Rheims, twelve miles away, is Berry-au-Bac, where there was a large sugar factory and quite a town, now nothing but shell holes and dugouts in a soft chalky sort of soil. A canal runs through the place. The French were in these dugouts until 1917 when the Germans trenched in and placed big mines, blowing up the hill and destroying an entire French battalion, and leaving great craters that now look like an erupted Vesuvius. The trees and green that were once here are now just irregular chalk white hills, all shell holes. Mary Pickford visited here in 1921.

We went into the dugouts here at Berry-au-Bac.

There are great piles of barbed wire and corrugated iron all around. The locks in the canal that were destroyed have been rebuilt so the boats are running as of old and the bridges have been replaced. Only one or two stone houses have been built, all other buildings—one story—just sheds of wood.

Where there were great level battlefields of barbed wire entanglements coming to this town from Rheims, are now fine cultivated grain fields with piles of barbed wire all along the front as we pass on the road.

In Rheims there are a few wooden houses of fine architectural style erected with modern improvements but the natives prefer the old style plain stone house without improvements, so will not accept them.

Monument to the Tanks

There is a monument to the Tank Division near Berry-au-Bac, for it was near here that the tanks first got in their most deadly work against the Germans and made a great name for themselves. Along the Hindenburg line the barbed wire is still much in evidence and the cement gun emplacements still remain with their automatic closing concrete doors 16 inches thick. The land all through this district has not been reclaimed.

Chemin des Dames is now just a barren waste. Here is where the heavy fighting took place all through the war. Germans captured the hill in 1918, only holding it for three days.

This was formerly a beautiful village on a high hill where Louis XV had his special lady favorites so the road leading to the Palace where they resided thus named—Dames.

British, French and German cemeteries all along this road.

The old Roman road has just been rebuilt. It was nearly destroyed by Germans and runs straight from Laon to Rheims.

We passed along one waterless canal. Our guide pointed it out as the canal the Germans dried up. It has not been re-locked and re-watered yet.

Soissons a Dirty Town

Soissons is a dirty old town of narrow streets that had about 15,000 inhabitants, and shows the ravages of war more than any other town visited or other cathedral. Other buildings are in such a state of partial destruction and everything seems so unclean and unkempt.

About five miles out of the city we passed a large sugar refinery where beet sugar was formerly made. Here there were two hundred large tractor ploughs drawn up in a row, sent over by the Americans for the first plowing of the great acreage of fine land for early crop raising. There is quite a field of beets now growing, but most of the land was laid down to grain which is now being harvested.

A small village within three miles of the town was the line of battle and nearly destroyed. There is a quarry of soft white stone hard by, also a large brick kiln, so their place is being speedily rebuilt in a very attractive manner by combining the red brick with white stone is quarried in large blocks about five feet in size and sawed into proper with ordinary crosscut saws, after being to the building. The stone makes a trim, and hardens after a few years in the air. Soissons was occupied by the in 1914, and again in 1918, when the finally captured it.

AMID THE RUINS OF RHEIMS STANDS THE FAMOUS OLD CATHEDRAL.

Barbed Wire Still Stands

In coming here we passed through towns that had been destroyed and running through battlefields for miles where the barbed wire entanglements standing, shell holes in all directions thing is now grown up to weeds, but wicked sight to see the destruction of magnificent trees, some of the stumps by the roadside and in the fields, the shells still being in them. It was convincing of the ruthlessness of the the ruins of one of the towns where been housed and fed so long by the men, while they occupied it so long as quarters.

I did not have much idea of conditions region when I left home, but am very that I made the trip, for one can hardly stand when they look at these great left standing but riddled with shot just what danger and hardship one through to come over here and end the completely destroy all the buildings, everything beautiful.

Villers Cotterets, where the big drive driving the Germans to Soissons and country, we find piles and piles of mets and other war stuff as well as planes and barbed wire.

This is a very productive soil around the grain crops are very large as the all been cleared. This appears to be over France for it seems as if nature herself in giving these people a great of crops to make up for the years that was given a rest during the war period.

Many of the level grain fields stretch and miles and remind one of our Western ritory.

St. Chambrey, a monument to the Battle Marne, 1914, is the last shown as we

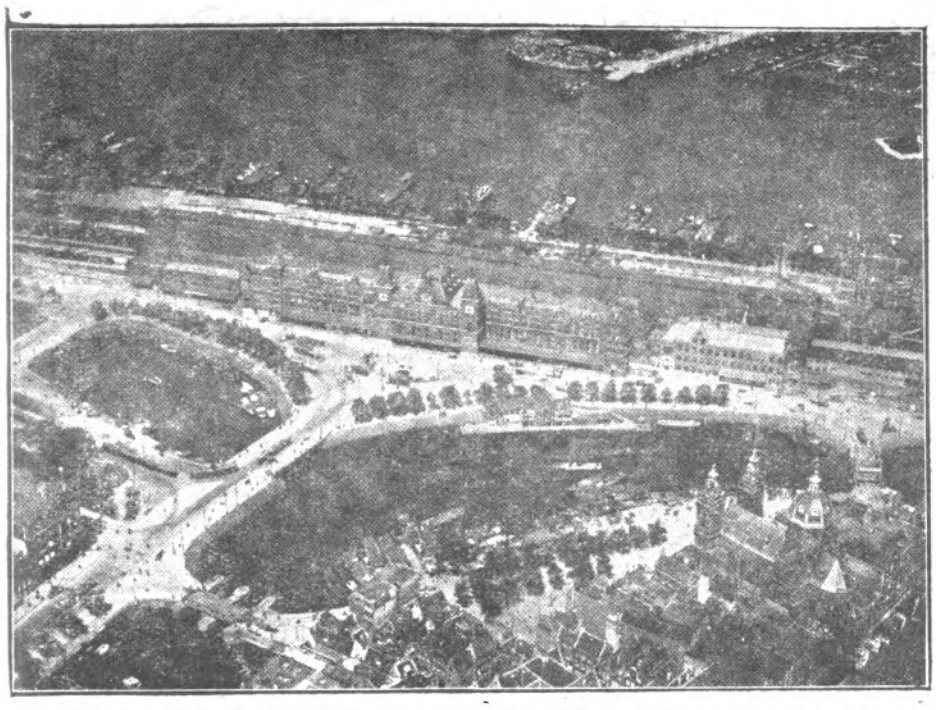
I Resume My Journey by Air

Paris to Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine

Paris, Sunday, August 20.—After three of ground hogging, I am again taking at six o'clock in the morning, this time five-seater—or six with the pilot—and I only passenger, going from Paris to Stras which is about three hundred miles, and is to be made in three hours.

The pilot motions for me to sit up beside in the rear of the car and out in the have no helmet but turn my thin cap, back and hop to it, my regular glasses ing for goggles. I supposed I would sit enclosed body of the plane and did not prepared for an open-air ride. The has no side wings, but I seem to get right by myself, low in the seat and hand on the top of my cap to keep it on

I was obliged to get up at 4.30 o'clock is a ten-mile ride out here to the aerodrome they came for me in the auto at 5 o'clock to be on hand to start at 6, thus I had fast on the way out in the auto.



There is no air stirring on the ground none up above, only what we stir up as we swiftly along. The sun is just rising as directly for it, for we seem to be going east, but soon veer a little to the south I am sitting close to the compass and can its every movement.

As we plane along I notice that grain to be the principal crop in this as in other tions of France, and as it is just being it makes a very pleasing sight to look the golden stacks. As we get more into level country, we see more woods and less vation, but very little water. Where water a thin fog hangs down over it and we cross the River Marne we do not see water, just white clouds hanging low to ground. This is the case in the low land particularly noticeable when we cross the River, for only by the pilot making sign did I know there was any river there. I am near enough to the revolving map to read the names of only some of the larger towns distinctly notice Nancy and the pilot points to it as we pass over. This is the largest we have gone over, it having 135,000 inhabitants it is about one hundred miles from Strasbourg I well remember the name of this place as it was where my son Guy was located at one when he was over here on Red Cross work 1918. So I took a good look at it, many sand feet below, but guess I went in and the city a lot quicker than Guy did in his ains. This Black Forest looms up pretty big ut we cross this great divide at the narrow nd and are then in Alsace, 25 miles from Strasbourg, where everything looks more like vegetables than grain crops. We first cross over the battle-fields of Luneville and Olvricourt, which is as near as we got to the fighting territory on this trip, although we go near Commercy, Ligney au Bois, Barly Duc, St. Dizen, St. Mihiel, Chateau Thierry and Meaux.

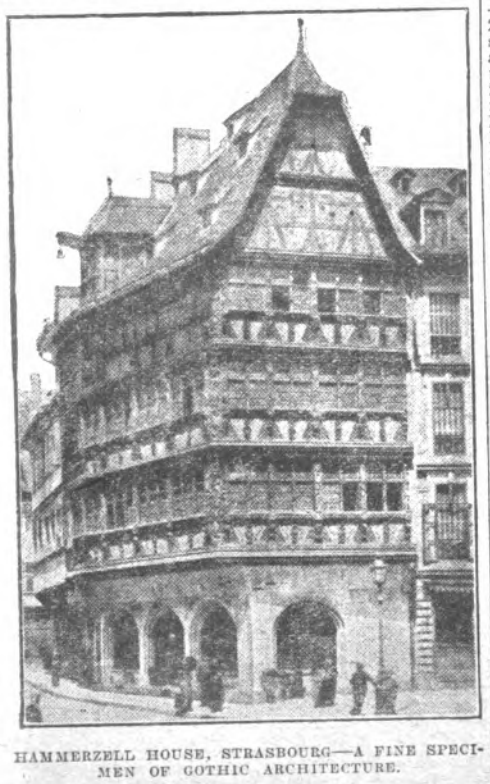
Strasbourg is a wonderful old city of nearly 200,000 inhabitants, was founded in the year 15 and has many fine old buildings, the great Cathedral with its marvelous automatic clock sixty feet tall being the most famous, as it shows the history of Christ and His Apostles and many other incidents in the world's progress. It has not been repaired for eighty years and still runs, although nearly 900 years old. Great crowds go to see it at 12 o'clock noon as when it strikes at that hour all the figures work and they have a choir sing and organ play, just after the cock crows three times during the outcoming of the twelve disciples.

There is a good large aerodrome here in Strasbourg and it is certainly a beautiful and well-kept city. The spire to the cathedral is one of the tallest (nearly 500 feet high) and most beautiful Gothic work in all of Europe.

There is a wonderful old museum here that is filled with very ancient and historic mementoes. Some of the buildings are of the most beautiful architecture I have ever seen. I had seven hours to remain in town and enjoyed every moment of my stay. It is a clean, quiet city, and now that the French are in control everybody seems to be happy and satisfied.



The post office building, which has statues of three German Emperors, looks quite imposing, only during the night of November 11th, 1918, when the Armistice was signed, they were beheaded by the Alsacians and now stand, three headless mementoes of the long German reign in this country.

The nearest I came to going to Germany was when I went out to take a look at Kehl bridge which spans the Rhine and separates Germany from France. It looked prosperous enough over there but I could not help contrasting the difference between this German territory and that in France, like Rheims and Soissons, all in ruins, that I visited only yesterday.

Had a fine return trip. One passenger we brought along came all the way from Vienna as this is a through line to Budapest, daily. We made the entire run of six hundred miles in six hours and got to Paris in season for dinner.

Paris to Brussels, Belgium

Paris, August 24.—We have a good day for our start for Brussels at 11.39. We are off in the same kind of plane as I went to Geneva in, but only five passengers and quite a lot of express packages. A man and his wife sit beside me who are natives of Australia but who now live in New York and have taken several air trips and think that's the way to travel. At 12 o'clock we pass over great stretches of forest and quite a large city on our left and river alongside. Going out of Paris we pass over the cities and towns of Compiegne, St. Quentin, Noyon, Mauberge, Mons, Braine le Comte. Did not go near the Argonne Forest so could not get a look at the place where the Armistice was signed.

We thought we were going to get a thrill as when flying about an hour, the pilot circled around a bit and prepared to drop. We thought it was to be an enforced landing, so we were looking all around for a good place to select for the stop—but nothing seemed to happen and I motioned the pilot to indicate if we were going lower and he said "no," so suppose we came to this lower level to get below the clouds that were coming in around us pretty thickly, and it enabled us to get a better view of the country also.

We land safely at the Aerodrome in Brussels in less than two hours from the time of starting. Brussels is a very large city as viewed from the sky and certainly seems big after we land. In the afternoon I get a guide and take a trip in an automobile seventeen miles out to see the ruins and reconstruction of this the nearest town that the Germans burned just to terrorize the people at the beginning of the war and to get back at them for preventing their quick march across Belgium into France.

We pass the ruins of a large chateau, a few miles from Brussels, that was burned because the owner was an officer in the Belgian army. The great Cathedral (St. Paul's) at Louvain was partly destroyed but is now being restored, while the very ancient and beautiful City Hall, near by, built in 1342, with its many elegantly carved statues standing all over the outside, was left untouched. There were 27,000 inhabitants here —over two thousand houses and stores burned, 219 men and women were killed at one time, shot by machine guns while they were standing against walls near railway station in 1914, and then buried in a little park near by. The buildings are built of brick and have mostly been rebuilt by the Government issuing bonds—three loans having been made—nearly all taken up by local people. There are 42 convents here and it is a college town as well. The white monks are also here—only the rich man can join this order.

The main roads in Belgium are all paved with granite blocks which have been relaid since the war. The road leading from Brussels that I autoed over is just straight for the 17 miles to Louvain as it possibly can be and runs on for hundreds of miles way into Germany. That is why they used it to march their millions of men over it—hard, level and smooth all the way through. Saw where Edith Cavell was shot in the shooting gallery in Brussels.

Gay Life in Evening

I was surprised to find so much gay life, especially in the evening. It is far ahead of Paris. Everybody seemed to be sitting out on the sidewalks in front of the cafes, eating, drinking and smoking—mostly drinking and smoking—for, as in London, all the women seem to delight in smoking cigarettes in public view. Having been through the long siege of war, they have now relaxed and they are trying to make up for the fun they lost in those trying times. They seem to have adapted themselves to the conditions. One notices the greater strides they have made in rebuilding the devastated towns than has been made in France. The people seem to have had money to take up the bond issues to help in the restoration. They have gone ahead without waiting for Germany to pay. They keep their standing army in good shape for they want to be able to help France to enforce payment of the reparations by Germany or to be ready for a fight in case of a showdown.

I noticed one thing in Brussels that I had not observed in any other city or country. This was the great artistically constructed iron telephone towers. They are fully 60 feet high and used instead of poles to sustain and carry the wires about the city. They being located so far apart I could not understand what prevented them from breaking. They don't have much snow or frost.

There are many dance halls about the town, which can be visited at the low price of one franc admission. They have continuous music from two orchestras and everyone seemed to be enjoying themselves fox trotting. As a franc now only means about eight cents in American money, one can see that a lot of entertainment can be gotten here for a small amount of cash, although the visitors are expected to buy light refreshment.

Brussels to Amsterdam, Holland

Brussels, August 25.—It has been a bit showery all night and through the day but we leave here at 2.15 and the sun is shining so guess we will reach Amsterdam all right. We have an entirely different type of car to go in—the Fokker—a five-seater, but it's a monoplane instead of a biplane such as I have been touring in and there are three seats abreast in the body of the car and two just in front of them with space for luggage alongside. It is much wider and more roomy than the closed automobiles—don't have to have any springs to the seats.

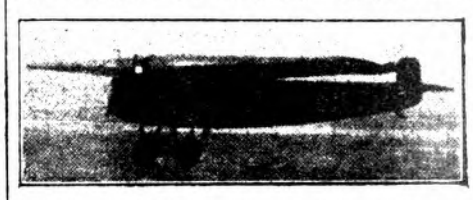
These planes are run from Holland and come across from Amsterdam and Rotterdam, meeting the other line from Paris. They are supposed to make close connections but sometimes there is a delay, of course, as is the case today, for I am sitting in the monoplane waiting for Paris plane to show up—it is now five minutes overdue.

This plane is fitted with life-preservers and first-aid outfit, also has a door up through the roof so the passengers can escape that way by pulling a cord and releasing the fastening in case of trouble on sea or land. This being a single engine, the propeller does not make quite so much noise but don't know that it rides quite as steady as a big biplane.

We pass several large cities in Belgium—Malins, Anvers, Esschen, and then come to a large fort situated on a small island near the frontier, and a lot of water shows up away off, and here we are in Holland.

The country changes very much in appearance —more white, chalky, sandy-looking soil and lots of woods—not many of the pretty looking towns with red-tiled-roof houses, but a more sparsely settled country.

We are flying pretty low so can get a good view of everything—can now see more large towns, and it is surely a flat looking country, but as we get further along it begins to look very picturesque with its dykes and the windmills showing up so clearly. There is a big fort on the shores of a wide body of water we just pass over, as I guess the "Dutch have really taken Holland," as the saying is, and are going to keep it. Some different flying over this country, surely, than it was in Switzerland.



We are landing at Rotterdam just an hour's run from Brussels—a little less than a hundred miles. Surely there are plenty of nice level green fields around here for landing—plenty of cows and sheep feeding.

An Eight Minutes' Stop

We land here for an eight minutes' stop. It is a big aerodrome and at Schiphol the building looks Dutchy. Just outside we get a good look at it quite near to as we take the air again, after setting my foot for the first time on the Dutch soil and having my passport attended to. We make a very quick get-away and I think to myself, MY! but this is a snappy-going little Bird, and I kind of like the way she speeds up so quickly in rising from the ground when a very snappy sound and a great noise suddenly develops in the engine and it keeps it up at a great rate for a few moments.

My two male companions don't think it amounts to anything but I thought my ear for engine-trouble was a little better trained than that, and I detected a skipping—more snapping—a terrible jumping—and awfully loud threshing—so very soon I noticed the pilot was putting us back to the aerodrome where we made a safe landing—just in time, for the thing stopped dead in an instant. We soon had a new spark-plug replacing the broken one, for that was the cause of the snapping sound, and as I saw the North Sea looming up so clearly at hand I thought I was glad we were not passing over that body of water when the trouble occurred—for it happened at just the right place.

We are again in the air and are now having a little sport so as to forget our near trouble, for a smaller monoplane than ours—a two-seater with a man and a woman in it are giving us a good race, and I can tell that the pilot is surely giving her the gas and "stepping on her" in good shape for we are gaily speeding along at a fine rate of speed and they don't pass us. But the fog is setting in and we will soon be in Amsterdam, anyway, so the race will be over very quickly, yet it is kind of exciting just the same for this is my first experience in fast airplaning, and for joy riding this way is great fun. My! but they have just gone by, so they won. Now the other machine is playing with us—first going up—then down. My companions are clapping their hands at them as they come very close in, then seesawing along same as going over undulating waves. It seemed very teetery to watch the other aeroplane as they manoeuvered their machine in following alongside of ours. They would drop way below and then rise—making long graceful curves the same as one would get in riding on the deep following waves or bounding billows of the great ocean, or riding on the roller coasters at Old Orchard—and the wind being with us made very fast going—lots over a hundred miles an hour. I was glad to have this little experience of what airplane racing is like.

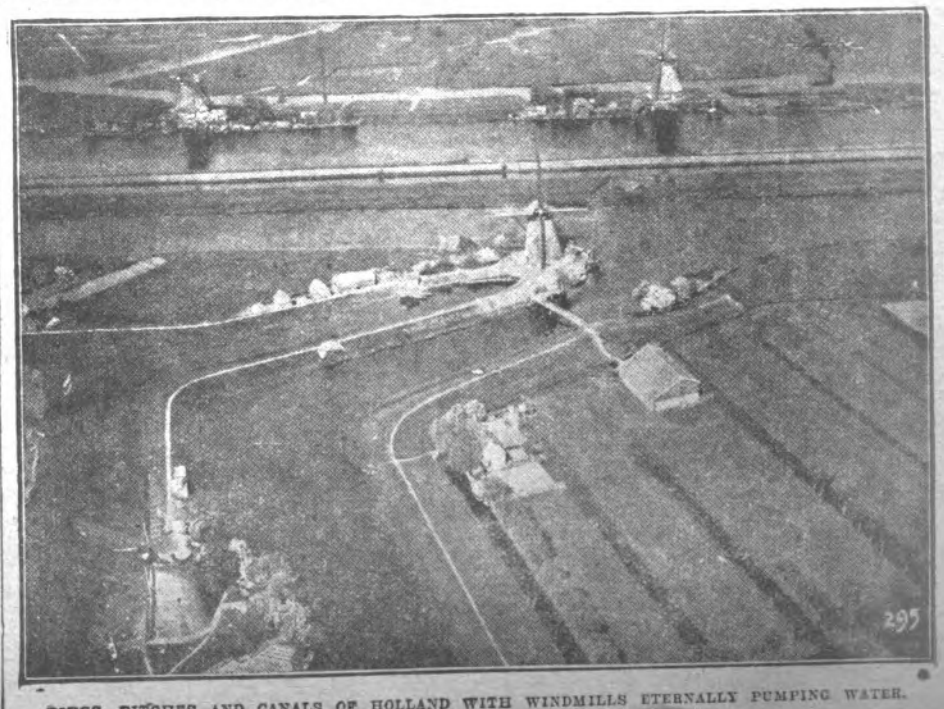
MONOPLANE, CALLED A FOKKER, CARRIED MR. GANNETT FROM BRUSSELS TO AMSTERDAM AND LONDON.

I wave my handkerchief and the fair Dutch lady in the machine answers back very gracefully as they speed along—first behind and then in front of us—and now we are landing at Amsterdam at 4.15, two hours from Brussels, including two stops. The aeroplane racing us was a military plane with an officer and his wife. They landed when we did at Rotterdam and then followed us here and landed.

Well, I am at last in real Holland—the land of water, windmills and wooden shoes, and it is certainly picturesque, surely, when one sees a pretty Dutch girl riding along on her bicycle with her wooden shoes on, and so many of these little drawbridges for the people to ride over and the canal boats to pass by. There are more than a million bicycles going and coming, I should say, when the people are all returning from work. I would like to fly over Holland in tulip time, for it would surely be a lovely picture to look down on—so many blossoms as they grow here in the season.

Amsterdam to London

Saturday, August 26.—A bright morning greets me after the rather unsettled day of Friday, and I look out of my window at the Hotel Amestelon to many quick-moving steam canal boats passing back and forth. I get my fill of good, mild, soft Dutch cheese for breakfast and get ready to start for Schiphol Aerodrome for my flight to London via Rotterdam, staying over one plane at Rotterdam for a short look about the town before leaving in the afternoon for England.



We were about half an hour late starting from Amsterdam. They had to wait for the mail which they carry, but we have got the brightest day for traveling we have had for some time. It looks kind of odd to see so many little narrow canals separating the cow pastures. They build fences with water here instead of wire. I wonder how many canal and other boats there are here, but I learn that every third person owns a bicycle, so there must be a quarer of a million of them (yesterday I thought sure there were a million (as there are 750,000 people living here. Naturally, there are quite a few accidents but the automobiles are not so very plentiful. I took a very fast ride in a nice speedy Packard coming from the Aerodrome to the city last night, so guess the speed laws are not very strict, but I felt nervous, although the roads were smooth, with brick pavements.

For companions I have Mr. and Mrs. Smith, from Cleveland, Ohio, who with daughter and son are going through to London this forenoon. It being their first experience in flying, they enjoy it very much, though, as we start out together. They seem to be a nice little family—all good sports, but the 18-years-old daughter seems to have led the way. She is now sitting beside me reading a continued story in the Saturday Evening Post of August 19th, and after having a good look at the country below, is thus serenely consuming home literature.

Short Stay in Rotterdam

We reach Rotterdam after half an hour's flying and as Mr. Smith is a bit nervous, this being his first experience in air travel, he prevails on me to go right along with them to London. In fact, as he afterwards acknowledged, he was scared blue and would have given up the trip if I had not been along with them. But as they are very agreeable traveling companions, I think I will enjoy the trip with them more than looking about Rotterdam for a few hours. This place looks even more "canally" and shipping-like than Amsterdam and almost as large. We have a half hour's extra stop here anyway as a slight oil leak developed and was repaired while we got some hot chocolate and light refreshments.

The pilot eventually decided to take a different plane as they don't stop the leak to suit him, and we finally start for London at 11.40, and I am pleased to have people to talk with, who thoroughly understand the English language. They seem to like to have me go along to keep their courage up, and we don't get a great way before Mrs. Smith gets air-sick as the ride gets to be quite bumpy. We pass The Hague at 12.15 and then cross quite a wide sheet of water and follow along the beach bordering on the North Sea for a long way, that has hundreds of breakwaters and dykes built out to hold the sands from being washed away.

We pass Heyst and Blankenberg, and soon come in sight of Zeebrugge, the base from which many of the German submarines worked.

Evidences of War

Evidences of the naval war are seen in the wrecks of several ships which were beached along the shores, some of them being quite large and half submerged. The sands show the ravages of battle in the form of huge shell craters. Then Ostend, with its many beach chairs and bathers in the surf. We are keeping right over the water all the way—quite a lot of sunken ships are seen along the shore. Then comes Nieuport and then more torn-up sand heaps, and then Dunkirk—another important war base, and finally Calais—quite a large city.

We have been going only about 1,200 feet high but now rise to nearly 3,000 feet as we cross the English Channel. The water looks very calm, so it is a good day to cross either by air or water, but it's more bumpy over land today than over the water, for both of the ladies in our party have been ill and I guess they feel they started on too long a trip for their first one in the air, and it being a monoplane, is not nearly as steady going as the larger biplanes that cross from other directions. It is a good test for air equilibrium to have others so air-sick sitting near me and to come through all right. They are not sick on sea while I am, so I can't quite understand the difference in the motion between an airship and a water-ship that affects different people in different ways.

We are just 17 minutes crossing the 26½ miles of water which requires about an hour and a half by steamer, and the chalk cliffs of Dover look pretty nice to us as we get back once more into Merrie England. We notice a difference in the motion of the machine as soon as we get over the land for the bumps again take us, but we have not far to go now, so the ladies are happy to think the trip is most over, but there seems to be a lot more rocking about than I have ever felt before. Mr. Smith inquires quite often if we are not most there and he has all he can do to keep from being ill himself, while his 14-years-old son and I are having a great time and enjoying the motion.

We finally land safely at Croydon at 2.30, being two hours and fifty minutes coming the last two hundred and forty miles, but the women are about the sorriest looking people you ever saw—they had been so very, very sick, and say, "Never again," but I am invited to the Savoy Hotel to dinner the next night after they have had a motor trip to Oxford and fully recovered from their air ailings, and they seem quite pleased to think they have had that experience in air travel. I am quite struck with the Sunday night dancing they have here in London. At the Savoy, especially, it is a very jazzy affair for staid old London which formerly was very quiet Sundays. Why, in Amsterdam, public dancing is not allowed in any form on any night and I always thought that city was a very open town. They seem to go in strong for big movie shows in Amsterdam, as they have very large and beautiful theaters given entirely over to the cinema—as they call it over here. In Paris the movie places are very small and not well patronized, but London has some large ones, only they are two years behind America in showing the big films. The "Four Horsemen" has just arrived.

Flew 2,500 Miles in 27 Hours

During the last five weeks I have had the delightful experience of having flown over 2,500 miles. This has occupied about 27 hours in the air and has been in eight different aeroplanes, and has been carried out in and over England, France, Alsace Lorraine, Switzerland, Belgium and Holland.

So well and so fast has this method of transport progressed that my various trips have been taken without any greater danger than would be encountered in covering the same number of miles by train and steamship. It has given me a far more comprehensive idea of the countries through which I have passed than I could ever have obtained in any other manner. And the travel has been accomplished so easily that I have absolutely no fatigue. To cover a stretch of 300 miles in a modern areoplane leaves the traveler actually refreshed, rather than worn from the experience—unless he happens to get nervous and air-sick. That will in time be realized by more business men and travelers, until it becomes the general mode of getting about for all but few bad air sailors.

I did not have time to go to Germany, but have met large numbers of Americans who have been there. Great numbers of them went to Oberammergau to witness the Passion Play.

They were nearly all well treated by the German people, though the prices were, without doubt up in every instance when an American hove in sight.

Some had had a little difficulty in bringing out articles they had purchased, but on the whole they complained very little.

Construction of a Regenerative Set

PART III.

Laying Out and Drilling Panel

THE panel, which may be a piece of hard wood, asbestos board, hard rubber Bakelite or similar substance of known insulating qualities, is the next step in the assembly of the set. The dimensions of the panel will probably vary with the individual tastes of the various readers who attempt the construction of this outfit, but should at least be the same length as the baseboard (16 inches). If hard wood is used for a panel it is suggested that oak be avoided as it contains acid which would somewhat affect its insulating value. Birch, maple or gumwood would do admirably for this purpose, and if a coat or two of varnish, well rubbed, be applied and allowed to dry well before the holes are drilled, a very neat looking instrument should result. If possible, however, procure a piece of Bakelite or hard rubber as better insulation will be assured. The amount of energy actually coming in on your antenna has been approximately at about a hundredth part of a fly-power; so it is quite apparent that there is no benefit to be derived from a leaky panel. As will be noted from the diagram (Fig. 5), the panel is 16 by 6 inches by ¼ inch thick and must be drilled exactly as shown. The holes for screws which hold the variable condenser in place are not shown as there are so many different makes of condensers which can be used that it would be impossible to supply this detail. Suffice it to say that any standard make of variable condenser having a capacity of .001 Microfarad (43 plate) will be well suited for the purpose, and it will be found a very simple matter to locate the holes for the screws once the condenser is obtained. The same problem is encountered in the case of the rheostat, there being dozens of good makes from which to choose. The diagram shows the locations of the shaft holes for the condenser and tickler coil, the audion bulb sight holes and centers for rheostat, switch and binding posts. The row of holes along the bottom edge is for 8 inch brass wood screws and may be countersunk so that the screw heads will come flush with the surface of the panel.

In the diagram (Fig. 5) all dimensions are figured from the left hand and lower edges. A and G are the holes for the antenna and ground binding posts respectively and are located on a line ⅝ inch in from the edge of panel. A is ⅝ inch from the upper edge and G is 1¼ inch from the lower edge. Holes BBBBBB are 3-16 inch holes located on a line 5-16 inch from lower edge of panel and are for convenience's sake placed on the same center lines with those for the condenser, switch, tickler, etc. They are to take 8 inch beveled head brass wood screws and should be countersunk, as before stated, in order that screw heads will not project above surface of panel. The center line, M, is drawn 3 5-16 inches above the lower edge and the lines Q, L and D are measured off on this line from the left-hand edge as follows: 3 by 3¼ by 3¼ inches, while the line F is measured 3¼ inches from line D. At the intersections of lines Q, M and D a deep mark should be made with a prick-punch to center the drill, also at the intersections on the line at BBBBBB. Hole S is located on line L at a distance of 2 inches from the lower edge of the panel and this same line also serves to locate the shaft holes for the rheostat and the bushing for the telephone jack. Line I is measured ⅝ inch in from the right-hand edge and locates holes XX, J and B. Holes XX are located ⅝ inch and 1 inch from the top of panel respectively while J is at the intersection of lines E and I. The holes for the switch points and stops are laid out as follows: Using the point S as a center, describe the arc of a one inch circle along which the eight switch points are located. The next step is to take a small pair of dividers and set them at about 5-16 inch, which should allow enough clearance at the rear of the panel for the nuts on the switchpoints. There being eight points, which is an even number, the dividers must be placed so as to exactly span the line L and a prickpunch mark is made at each point. Using these as points to work from, the other holes may be laid out, one at a time, and each should be prickpunched as soon as found with the dividers so as to provide a center for the next measurement with the dividers. When the whole operation is done there should be 10 holes—five on each side of the center line. The extra hole on each end is for the switch stops which are to prevent the switch arm from slipping off the last point at each end. The audion sight holes are laid off in a similar manner, using the intersection of lines F and H for a center. This point should first be prickpunched and the dividers are then set at a radius of ⅝ inch and a circle described at the point indicated. Then, using the same radius, step off six points on the circle which will just divide the circumference evenly into six parts, and make a punch mark at each point. Holes Y and Z are located on line M and are measured on this line as follows: Y is 1⅛ inch from line D to the right, while Z is 2⅞ inches to the left of line D. These holes are for the mounting screws for the coil and will receive further reference.

We are now ready to drill the panel and will perform all operations exactly as indicated below. Note that we show size of hole and directly after it the particular operation to be performed on it.

Holes A and G are 3-16 inch, drilled only. Holes BBBBBB, 3-16 inch, are drilled and countersunk. Audion sight holes all ¼ inch, drilled and deeply countersunk for appearance. Holes C, T and R are ¼ inch, drilled only. Holes Y and Z are 3-16 inch, drilled and countersunk for 8-32nd flat head screw head. Hole J is about 7-16 inch, drilled to fit jack. Holes XX are 3-16 inch, drilled only. Hole S will vary according to type of switch arm used. Holes for switch points and stops are all ⅛ inch and should be drilled and slightly countersunk so that points will seat firmly to panel. Switch stops may well be two pieces of ⅛ inch brass rod ½ inch long driven into the proper holes.

The Capacity Screen

The capacity screen consists of a thin sheet of tin or copper foil which is stuck to the rear of the panel with shellac or other adhesive and serves to prevent capacity effects from the body of the operator while tuning the set. The method of applying the screen is as follows: First lay the foil on a perfectly flat surface and with a smooth roller press out all possible wrinkles and air bubbles. Then give the rear of the panel a good coat of shellac and quickly touch a match to it. The alcohol and water in the shellac will burn off, leaving the surface very sticky. The foil is now carefully laid on the shellacked surface, and carefully rolled down smooth and should be allowed to dry thoroughly. Before mounting the various instruments, lay the panel face down and rub the foil hard with one finger until every hole in the panel shows up in sharp relief through the foil. Then with a sharp knife or a safety razor blade cut the foil away from the holes and leave at least ¼ inch margin to prevent any possible short circuit to any of the instruments or wiring except the ground lead or ground binding post, which is the correct place to connect the screen. Care should be taken that the capacity screen does not come in contact in any way with either side of the variable condenser circuit as this will render the set inoperative, it being advisable to cut away foil in the immediate area surrounding the metal parts of the condenser. The coil is mounted as follows: In the holes marked Y and Z beveled head 8-32 brass machine screws two inches long are set and are held firmly in place by means of a red fiber washer and a 3-16 inch brass washer and an 8-32 nut behind the panel. This leaves the two screws protruding straight back to the rear of panel and serves to support the antenna inductance. On each screw is placed another nut at a distance of about 1¼ inch from the first one, a brass washer, the inside tickler bearing, another washer, a nut, another washer, the antenna coil (through holes marked A and C, Fig. 2), another washer and another nut. Of course when this is done the tickler shaft will of necessity have to be inserted in the bearing and when coil is finally in place the tickler shaft will protrude through hole T (Fig. 5). The next step is to put in the switch points and switch arm the rheostat, variable condenser, jack and binding posts. The panel is then fastened to the baseboard by means of six brass flathead wood screws. When this is done, measure off and drill two 3-16 inch holes in the baseboard to correspond with the lower holes in the antenna tube and run up through these holes two 8-32 screws and fasten in place in a similar manner to the previous operation when mounting to panel. This makes the mounting of the coil more rigid and prevents any chance of accidentally bending coil out of position. The tube socket is mounted about three inches directly back of the rheostat and should be in such a position that the terminal marked G (Grid) is nearest the start of the antenna winding. This tends to eliminate long leads which are very detrimental to any set. The set is now ready for wiring.

Wiring and Operation

The connecting wires should all be run in straight lines and wherever necessary to make a bend in order to clear some obstruction a neat right angle should be effected by means of a pair of small-nosed pliers. All wiring, except in the case of the leads to the switch, should be made with No. 14 tinned bare copper wire. The various connections are clearly indicated in picture form (see Fig. 6), and we cannot see any possibility of an error if directions are faithfully followed. The two binding posts at the right end of the panel are to be used in case the operator does not wish to use a phone plug, or an amplifier may be connected at this point. In Fig 6 note that the small circle near the rheostat represents the positive A or filament current binding post, the circle AB—, the common post for the negative A and B batteries and the circle B-|- near the jack, the positive B post.

The grid condenser and leak is made up in one piece and must be bought from a radio dealer. The value of this condenser .00025 microfarads.

When connecting the antenna coil taps to the switch points, No. 1 tap goes to the first point at the left, and continues in rotation until all are soldered on. A small piece of fine rubber tubing or "spaghetti" insulating tubing should be slipped over each lead before soldering to the point. This tends to prevent any of the leads from getting short-circuited.

The dials should now be placed in their proper position on the condenser and tickler shafts and the batteries connected to the proper binding posts. If the polarities are correct a hissing sound should at once become apparent when the phones are connected into the plate circuit by means of either the jack or binding posts XX. The switch is now set on any point and the condenser dial slowly rotated until a signal is heard. Find the point at which signal is loudest and then adjust the tickler coil which will give a greatly increased volume. The adjustment of the rheostat is very important and care should be taken not to turn on too much current as the bulb may be burned out. This set should receive all signals included within the range of 150 to 1,000 meters.

The A battery is a six-volt storage battery, either an automobile battery or a radio battery. The B Battery is a special 22½-volt battery and must be bought from a radio dealer.

In making this set, if any reader experiences difficulty we shall be glad to hear from him and will give any details he may require.

Questions and Answers

Q.—What distance can music be heard on an Aeriola Senior set?

A.—We have heard approximately 1,200 miles under the best of conditions on this type of set.

Q.—Can I use the dry battery receiving tubes in my set which was made to use Raditrons?

A.—Yes. The dry battery tubes can be used, but adapters will be necessary to put these tubes in your sockets.

Q.—What is the difference between radio frequency and audio frequency amplification?

A.—Radio frequency amplification is that which takes place before the incoming wave is rectified, and audio is that which takes place after the wave is rectified.

Q.—Who is Station P W X?

A.—P W X is the broadcasting station at Havana, Cuba.

Q.—Sometimes while listening to a broadcasting station, I hear a continuous whistling and cannot get rid of it. If I change to some other station I do not get this whistle so I don't think it is my set. Can you tell me the cause of it?

A.—As near as we can tell by your description, the whistle is caused by two sending stations being on the same wave length.

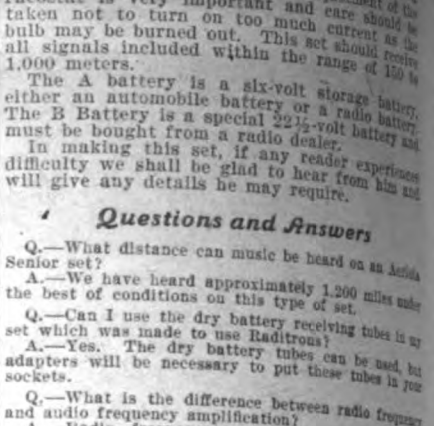
Q.—In the set you are describing in COMFORT what is the wave length and about what is the cost of building?

A.—The wave length of this set will be about 360 meters and the approximate cost will be $35.

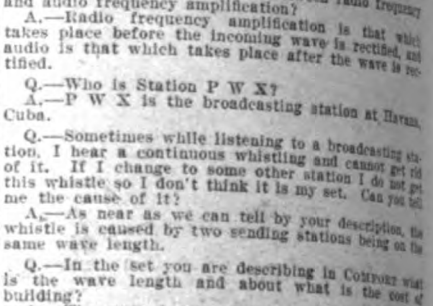
Q.—Is it true that the direction of the antenna has a great effect on the reception?

A.—Yes, the direction of the antenna has an effect upon the reception, and to get the best results the aerial should point towards the station you desire to receive, taking the lead off the opposite end.

Q.—What is the cost of the tubes which work on dry cells?



A.—These tubes cost $6.50 and can be bought at any radio dealer's.



Q.—The amateurs are supposed to send on 200 meters and the music on 360 meters. Why do I hear the amateurs and the music at the same time?

A.—This is because the amateur station is so near you that you cannot tune them out, or else the amateur station is not properly tuned.

Q.—Who is Station K S D?

A.—K S D is the broadcasting station at St. Louis, Mo.

WIRELESS telephone receiving sets are comparatively easy to make. The man or boy with any mechanical ability whatever should be able to construct his own receiving apparatus by following the instructions in this book. The different parts that go to make up Radio receivers may now be purchased in almost any hardware or general store. Many of the parts can be made at home. This book shows you how to assemble them so as to make a receiving set which if purchased outright would cost many times what you pay for the component parts. It tells how to make not only one, but several different styles of receivers. It illustrates and describes every step of the process and the instructions are easy to understand because technical terms are avoided wherever possible.

Written by twenty Radio experts, this book is, for its size, one of the most authoritative yet published. It is 7½x5½ inches in size, contains one hundred pages and ninety illustrations and diagrams. Also in the back of the book is the official application blank of the Radio League of America and full instructions as to you becoming a member and receiving a membership certificate and button. Causes of Tail Rubbing

IT is not generally understood that a foul condition of the sheath may cause a horse to rub persistently at every opportunity until the hair at the root of the tail is worn off and the skin made sore. Lack of exercise, inadequate grooming, over-feeding and standing in an insanitary stable are contributing causes. In all cases the gelding's sheath should be thoroughly cleansed when tail-rubbing becomes a habit. A "bean" of dried sebulous matter may also be found in a little sac near the opening of the urethra or urinary passage and should be removed. It interferes with urination and not only induces tail-rubbing but may cause the horse to walk and trot stiffly or have a straddling gait. Mares sometimes rub the tail for the reason that there is a foul condition between the teats of the udder and on each side of that organ. These parts should be cleansed, dried and well dusted with Fuller's earth.

Parasitic mites often are present in the worst forms of tail-rubbing and itching mane. They invade the part when it is not kept clean. Scurf or dandruff forms quickly and thickly on the skin of the parts mentioned and offers a suitable condition for parasitic mites. Similar mites sometimes cause inchiness of the hairy legs of heavy draft horses. Lack of cleanliness and not drying off the skin after washing also favor that condition. Cleanse the affected parts, pour on and rub in a mixture of one part of kerosene and three parts of machine oil or cottonseed oil and then at intervals of three days apply freely a mixture of two ounces of flowers of sulphur, one-half ounce of coal tar dip and one pint of sweet oil or cottonseed oil. Make the horse take exercise every day he does not work. Groom him well daily. Lessen the grain feed when itchiness of the skin is present. Put a plank shelfwise around in the inside of the box-stall, in which the horse should be stabled, so that the root of the tail cannot be got in contact with the stall wall when the horse tries to rub. These measures of treatment should soon prove remedial.

Questions and Answers

ROPY MILK.—I have a full-blooded Jersey heifer which freshened just before she was two years old. She seems healthy, but her milk, after standing two days, is stringy and slippery. She is due to freshen in March. What would you advise me to do? Is her milk all right to use? F. E. H.

A.—Bacteria (germs) in the milk utensils cause the condition. The water used for cooling the milk or cleansing or drinking purposes is the usual source of the infection. More scrupulously cleanse, scald and sun dry the milk vessels. Use a good washing powder or some hypochlorite of soda in the washing water. Handle and set the milk and cream in a new clean place. Scrub the water trough or tank and disinfect it with chloride of lime; also the cooling tank. Keep cow away from surface water. Cleanse udder and teats before milking.

GARGET.—What is garget and how can one tell whether a cow has garget or not? My cow had her right front quarter hurt about two months ago and since then has given bloody milk and out of that quarter. D. C.

A.—Inflammation of the mammary glands (udder), technically termed mammitis, is popularly called "garget." It is characterized by swelling, heat, pain and redness of the udder and the milk becomes clotted and eventually may contain pus or appear like whey and have a bad odor. Bleeding shows that there is an injury to the blood-vessels of the udder in the case mentioned or there may be growths in the teat which bleed from irritation at milking time. The affected milk is unfit for use. That from the sound quarters may be used. Strip the affected quarter three times daily, massage the part well each time and night and morning rub in a mixture of one part each of fluid extracts of poke-root and belladonna leaves and six parts of compound soap liniment.

GARGET.—I have a Jersey cow four years old. I keep her in a pen and have milked her myself all the time and know she has never been hurt. One quarter of the udder has nearly dried up. She is giving 22 pounds of milk each day. Until the calf was four months old she gave 40 pounds. MRS. W. J. M.

A.—Garget has affected one quarter, ruined it for milk production and so affected the rest of the udder that milk secretion has diminished. It would be well to have the cow tested with tuberculin as tuberculosis sometimes causes such a condition of the udder and the milk in that event is dangerous for use by man or animals. Meanwhile milk the sound quarters three times daily and dry off the remaining secretion in the diseased quarter. Such a cow should be isolated and milked by one who does not handle the other cows as infection from a diseased udder may readily be carried by the milkers' hands to other cows.

SPLINTS.—I have a good work and saddle horse. Two small knots have formed just below his knee on the inside of one of his front legs and one on the hind leg just below his hock on the inside, and they seem to be hard. Please tell me what will remove them without injuring the horse. J. J. T.

A.—We suspect that small bony growths called splints have formed and as they do not cause lameness it would be best to leave them alone. If you prefer to treat the condition try the effect of tincture or iodin applied twice a week after clipping off the hair.

SORES ON CANARY.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my bird and how to cure him? He is six months old, has sores on head which have been there since he was eight weeks old, his head has never feathered out good, he kicks at sores continually, dark blood comes from one next to bill, pus from another by bill and has one on back of head which has never broke that is soft. I have looked for mites and lice but found none. He sings well and seems healthy other ways. MRS. G. W.

A.—Cleanse the head perfectly with hot water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve. Afterwards dust the sores with boric acid and repeat the treatment once or twice a week as found necessary.

DISEASED COW.—I have a Jersey cow which freshened last September. She is poor. She eats heartily, but has a cough. I feed her bran and cottonseed meal. Before this she gave three gallons of milk a day and now gives about three quarts and the milk doesn't have much cream on it. MRS. A. C. J.

A.—This cow is probably badly affected with tuberculosis which is contagious and incurable and makes the milk dangerous for use by man or animals. We should advise destroying her at once. If you do not care to do that, have the tuberculin test applied by a veterinarian and if the cow reacts dispose of her as the veterinarian advises as he may be able to get some reimbursement money from the state. Meanwhile isolate the cow, reject her milk and cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the stable she has occupied.

AILING MARE.—I have a mare, six years old, that had a colt last May. Soon after the colt was born she began losing flesh. She has a good appetite and eats anything I feed her, but appears to be easily choked, stops eating and bits of food come through her nostrils. Please advise me what to do. G. N. P.

A.—Have the mare's teeth put in order by a veterinarian as it is quite likely that a split or diseased molar tooth or sharp points and irregularities of the teeth cause all of the symptoms described. Do not give drugs of any kind. Feed well on oats, bran, ear corn, carrots and good mixed clover and timothy hay, or upland prairie hay if such is available in your district. Wet all feed with lime-water. If the cough continues give her one-half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning for two weeks, then gradually discontinue the medicine, taking 10 days to the process. If partial paralysis of the throat is not present she should improve quickly.

RICKETS.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my hogs? They seem well and do fine until seven months old, then they lose control of their hind legs, cannot stand on them at all. At first they seem to walk on their toes, and then it isn't long before they cannot walk at all. They appear to have a good appetite but fall away to skin and bones. I have had five litters and all acted the same way. They have a good pen, but it is rather damp. I would like to know what to do for them. H. C. K.

A.—The pigs are afflicted with rickets which is similar to bowed legs in a child. The cause is lack of exercise, insanitary quarters and inadequate or incomplete feeding. In future have pigs graze green clover, alfalfa, rape, peas and oats, soy beans, etc., throughout the growing season and also feed skim milk and mixed meals. At all times allow access to air slaked lime, salt and wood ashes and bone meal. The pigs may recover if you give each of them one-half to one ounce of cod-liver oil daily in addition to milk, mixed meals, including tankage and fine-cut alfalfa or clover hay. Also let them run out for exercise.
